

Israel Noah Shuman,
Harvard University

1427 Madison Ave
New York.

 I. N. Shuman.

131 W. 110th St.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2009

THE LIFE AND WORKS

OF

GOETHE:

WITH

SKETCHES OF HIS AGE AND CONTEMPORARIES,

FROM

PUBLISHED AND UNPUBLISHED SOURCES.

BY

G. H. LEWES,

AUTHOR OF 'THE BIOGRAPHICAL HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY,' ETC.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

Goethe's heart, which few knew, was as great as his intellect, which all knew. — JUNG STILLING.

BOSTON :

TICKNOR AND FIELDS.

M DCCC LVI.

CAMBRIDGE:
THURSTON AND TORRY, PRINTERS.

TO

THOMAS CARLYLE,

WHO FIRST TAUGHT ENGLAND TO APPRECIATE GOETHE,

THIS WORK IS INSCRIBED

AS A MEMORIAL

OF GRATITUDE FOR INTELLECTUAL GUIDANCE,

AND OF

ESTEEM FOR RARE AND NOBLE QUALITIES.

PREFACE.

---

THERE was no life of Goethe in existence when I first began mine, now nearly ten years ago. The meagre notices by Scühtz and Döring were little more than abridgments of the autobiographical sketch published under the title of Poetry and Truth from my Life. Readers unacquainted with this Autobiography may perhaps imagine that the existence of such a work, coupled with the absence of any attempt at a fuller biography, is a proof that, by Germans at least, no biography was wanted. I will not pause to show in detail how false such a conclusion would be, but content myself with the proof which is carried in the fact that, since my intended undertaking was made known, two substantial biographies have appeared, one in four volumes, the other in two. Herr Viehoff declares in his preface that he considered the honor of German literature was at stake if an Englishman were allowed to be the first biographer of the great German; and to prevent such a scandal, he resolved on the devotion of 'German diligence and German fidelity' to the task. The result has been a laborious work in four volumes, containing in all 2,564 pages.* Yet in spite of this mass of material, much valuable matter finds no place in his pages: partly because it has been published since he wrote, and partly because he had no access to unpublished material. Indeed, he has confined himself so exclusively to printed matter, that he has not even visited Weimar, where seven-and-fifty years of Goethe's life were passed. Thus he writes of Goethe as he might write of Cicero. A similar defect is noticeable in Herr Schäfer's Biography.† By more compact treatment, and by the omission of critical considerations on the various works, Herr Schäfer brings his material within two volumes. Not only is this work somewhat richer than Viehoff's, it is also preferred by the Germans on account of its compactness.

It would ill become me to express any opinion on the merits of these performances; but it would be still worse to omit the amplest acknowledgment of the aid I have derived from them. The first volume of Viehoff reached me only when I had already completed my first volume, and made me regret that I had not earlier been able to take advantage of it; in rewriting this volume, as well as in writing the second, I have made the freest use both of his and of Schäfer's work. Acknowledgment of assistance is a cardinal point in literary courtesy too often neglected; and my book is in spirit, form and matter so widely different from those of Viehoff and Schäfer, containing so much which they have not, and omitting so much which they contain, that a reader who should make a comparison, remembering that the same sources were open to me as to them, would probably form no idea of the assistance I have received; I am therefore the more anxious to acknowledge it.

* Goethe's Leben: von Heinrich Viehoff, 1847-1853.

† Goethe's Leben: von J. W. Schäfer, 1851.

Nor can I let this opportunity pass without recording my debt to Mrs. Austin's delightful work Goethē and his Contemporaries, of which Falk's Reminiscences forms the nucleus. This book was a loved companion long before I could read German; and, in common with many readers, I felt very grateful to Mrs. Austin for the mass of details, and occasional fine remark, with which she gave us glimpses of that distant world. The book has been of service to me in more than one chapter of this biography. The reader is advised to get it at once, together with Mr. Oxenford's translation of Eckermann's Conversations; for not only will they charm by their contents, but assist him in forming a conception of Goethe as he was in the decline of life.

Mr. Oxenford has also translated the Wahrheit und Dichtung,* so that the English reader may judge how far the Autobiography renders a biography superfluous. One objection, indeed, will occur at the outset: Goethe lived to the age of eighty-two, and his Autobiography only includes the first five or six-and-twenty years. Nor will the Annals (Tag und Jahres Hefte) supply the deficiency. A more serious objection, however, rises from the nature of the work. That work has great charm, but the charm is scarcely, if at all, the kind which belongs to Autobiography. Its calm artistic delineation of men, scenes and influences, and the occasional episodes of winning grace, however we may prize them, only approximate to Autobiography; left as they are without the precise detail, and above all without the direct eloquent egotism which constitutes the value and the interest of such works. Liberal enough in dissertation, and in record of details respecting others, he is provokingly reticent about himself; nay, in one place, he actually apologizes for speaking of himself; which in an Autobiography is surely misplaced modesty?

* In Bohn's Standard Library, vol. xxxi.

To the biographer, this Wahrheit und Dichtung is almost as much of a stumbling block as a stepping stone; at least I found it so. In obedience to the advice of German friends, and to what seemed the most natural plan, I originally confined myself to the reproduction and abridgment of it in the first three Books, merely correcting inaccuracies, and inserting such novelty of detail as had come to hand. It seemed proper to let him speak for himself wherever that could be done. But this plan was more plausible than felicitous; and on rewriting the first volume — which I did during my last residence in Germany through the autumn and winter of 1854-5 — I found it indispensable to recast the whole, and begin again upon a different principle. Thus the Autobiography came to be treated only as one of the various sources from which the story was to be constructed. The main reason for this was the abiding inaccuracy of tone, which, far more misleading than the many inaccuracies of fact, gives to the whole youthful period, as narrated by him, an aspect so directly contrary to what is given by contemporary evidence, especially his own letters, that an attempt to reconcile the contradiction is futile. If any one doubts this, and persists in his doubts after reading the first volume of this work, let him take up Goethe's Letters to the Countess von Stolberg, or the recently published letters to Kestner and Charlotte, and compare their tone with the tone of the Autobiography, wherein the old man depicts the youth as the old man saw him, not as the youth felt and lived. The picture of youthful follies and youthful passions comes softened through the distant avenue of years. The turbulence of a youth of genius is not indeed quite forgotten, but it is hinted with stately reserve. Jupiter, serenely throned upon Olympus, forgets that he was once a rebel with the Titans.

When we come to know the real facts, we see that the Autobiography does not so much misstate as understate; we, who can 'read between the lines,' perceive that it errs more from want of sharpness of relief and precision of detail than from positive misrepresentation. Controlled by contemporary evidence, it furnishes one great source for the story of the early years; and I greatly regret there is not more contemporary evidence to furnish more details.

For the later period, besides the mass of printed testimony in shape of Letters, Memoirs, Reminiscences, etc., I have endeavored to get at the truth by consulting those who lived under the same roof with him, those who lived in friendly intercourse with him, and those who have made his life and works a special study. I have sought to acquire and to reproduce a definite image of the living man, and not simply of the man as he appeared in all the reticences of print. For this purpose I have controlled and completed the testimonies of print by means of papers which have never seen the light, and papers which, in all probability, never will see the light — by means of personal corroboration, and the many slight details which are gathered from far and wide when one is alive to every scrap of authentic information and can see its significance; and thus comparing testimony with testimony, completing what was learned yesterday by something learned to-day, not unfrequently helped to one passage by details furnished from half-a-dozen quarters, I have formed the conclusions which appear in this work. In this difficult, and sometimes delicate task, I hope it will be apparent that I have been guided solely by the desire to get at the truth, not having any cause to serve, any partisanship to mislead me, or personal connection to trammel my judgment. It will be seen that I neither deny, nor attempt to slur over, points which may tell against him. The man is too great and too good to forfeit our love, because on some points he may incur our blame.

Considerable space has been allotted to analyses and criticisms of Goethe's works. In the life of a great Captain, much space is necessarily occupied by his campaigns. By these analyses I have tried to be of service to the student of German literature, as well as to those who do not read German ; and throughout it will be seen that pains have not been spared to make the reader feel at home in this foreign land.

The scientific writings have been treated with what proportionately may seem great length ; and this, partly because science filled a large portion of Goethe's life, partly because, even in Germany, there is nothing like a full exposition of his aims and achievements in this direction. Many readers will be interested in the subject : and it may be satisfactory to them to know that one of the most eminent scientific authorities in Europe has given his sanction to my exposition.

LONDON, OCTOBER, 1855.

CONTENTS

OF

THE FIRST VOLUME.

---

BOOK THE FIRST.

THE CHILD IS FATHER TO THE MAN.

1749 to 1765.

---

CHAPTER I.

PARENTAGE.

Character and extent of Goethe's claims to greatness. — Hereditary transmission of qualities. — Goethe's ancestry. — Genealogical tables. — Character of Goethe's father and mother. — Subjection of the emotions to the reason . . . . . 3

CHAPTER II.

THE PRECOCIOUS CHILD.

Birth of Goethe. — Character of the epoch. — Twofold character of Frankfurt. — Feeling for Italy. — Moderate elevation of Goethe's social status. — Maternal tuition. — His love for his sister Cornelia. — His love of story-telling. — Grandmother and grandfather Textor. — Early Compositions in Latin and German. — Character of Goethe's precocity. — His school life . . . . . 17

CHAPTER III.

EARLY EXPERIENCES.

Character not formed by circumstances. — Early religious doubts awakened by the Lisbon earthquake. — Early symbolical representation of the soul's aspirations to the Deity. — The Seven Years' War. — Invention of little stories. — Occupation of Frankfurt by the French. — The French theatre. — Duel with Derones — His first play . . . . . 29

CHAPTER IV.

VARIOUS STUDIES.

Departure of the French and resumption of study. — The Polyglott romance. — Biblical studies. — Influence of Fräulein von Klettenberg. — Early love for Gretchen. — Disappointment. — Fascination exercised by Goethe . . . . . 40

CHAPTER V.

THE CHILD IS FATHER TO THE MAN.

Characteristics of the man to be traced in the moral lineaments of the child. — Characteristics of Goethe. — His many sidedness. — His seriousness, formality and rationality. — His impatient susceptibility . . . . . 46

BOOK THE SECOND.

STUDENT DAYS.

1765 to 1771.

CHAPTER I.

THE LEIPSIK STUDENT.

Goethe commences his collegiate life at Leipsic. — Wearies of logic and jurisprudence. — Appearance in society. — Acquaintance with Frau Böhme. — Literary society at the table d'hôte of Herr Schönkopf. — Falls in love with Anna Katharina Schönkopf. — Description of Goethe in Horn's letters to Moors. — Composition of 'Die Laune des Verliebten.' — Works of Goethe an embodiment of his experiences. — Pranks and extravagances with Behrisch. — Composition of 'The Fellow Sinners' . . . . . 53

CHAPTER II.

MENTAL CHARACTERISTICS.

Subjective and objective intellects. — Antagonism between the ideal and the real. — Objective character of Goethe's genius. — Concrete tendency in his works. — Comparison of Goethe with Shakespeare. — Moral toleration . . . . . 72

CHAPTER III.

ART STUDIES.

Goethe neglects his collegiate studies. — His love songs. — Joins Oeser's drawing class. — Trip to Dresden. — Learns engraving. — Serious illness. — State of religious doubt. — Returns to Frankfurt . . . . . 78

CHAPTER IV.

RETURN HOME.

Goethe's reception at home. — Letters to Käthchen Schönkopf. — Marriage of Käthchen with Dr. Kanne. — Unpleasant relations with his father. — Studies in alchemy. — Religion more prominently in his thoughts. — Passing affection for Charity Meixner . . . . . 84

CHAPTER V.

STRASBURG.

Goethe proceeds to Strasburg university. — Description of his person. — Strasburg cathedral. — General progress. — Disgust at the 'Système de la Nature.' — Raphael's cartoons. — Ominous pictures exhibited to Marie Antoinette. — Goethe's French verses. — Mystical metaphysical studies. — Early tendency towards Nature-worship. — Giordana Bruno. — Notes on Bayle's criticism. — Remarkable comment on a chapter in Fabricius. — Improvement in his demeanor. — Increased circle of friends. — First meeting and friendship with Stilling. — Friendship with Franz Lersé. — Conquers his irritability and sensitiveness. — Two love poems. — Dancing at Strasburg. — Story of Emilia and Lucinda, the dancing-master's daughters . . . . . 93

CHAPTER VI.

HERDER AND FREDERIKA.

Goethe's German culture. — Acquaintance with Herder. — Herder's opinion of Goethe. — His influence. — Strange introduction of Goethe to the Brion family. — Frederika. — Goethe's letter. — Affection of Goethe and Frederika. — Goethe obtains his doctor's degree. — Frederika's visit to Strasburg. — Effect of Shakespeare on Germany. — Goethe's oration on Shakespeare. — His tractate on German architecture. — Parting with Frederika . . . . . 114

BOOK THE THIRD.

STURM UND DRANG.

1771 to 1775.

CHAPTER I.

DR. GOETHE'S RETURN.

Goethe's reception by his father. — Commencement of the Storm and Stress period. — Goethe's reluctance to appear in print. — His anguish at having renounced Frederika. — Reasons why he did not marry her. — Antagonism between domesticity and genius. — Egoism of genius. — Hard work — Johann Heinrich Merck. — The Frankfurter Gelehrten Anzeigen. — Goethe's fondness for skating . . . . . 141

CHAPTER II

GÖTZ VON BERLICHINGEN.

Three versions of 'Götz.' — Goethe's own account of the composition. — Character of Gottfried with the Iron Hand. — Battle for individual liberty in the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries compared. — 'Götz' a dramatic chronicle, not a drama. — Singularly un-Shakespearian in construction, in the presentation of character, and in the language. — The first-born of the romantic school. — Its injurious influence on dramatic art. — Its originality denied by Hegel. — 'Götz' a marvellous work . . . . . 153

CHAPTER III.

WETZLAR.

Meagre account of Wetzlar in Goethe's Autobiography. — The imperial court of justice, a German chancery. — The Teutsche Haus. — The Round Table and its knights. — Description of Goethe by Kestner. — His acquaintance with Gotter. — Connection with the Gottingen school. — Moral contest between individuals and government. — Literary and philosophic insurrection — Goethe falls in love with Charlotte Buff. — Kestner's engagement to Charlotte. — Jerusalem's unhappy passion. — Goethe's visit to Höpfner. — Melancholy departure from Wetzlar . . . 169

CHAPTER IV.

PREPARATIONS FOR WERTHER.

Goethe interrogates fate whether he should become an artist. — Maximiliane von Laroche. — Excursion with Merck. — Studies at Frankfurt. — Re-writing 'Gotz von Berlichingen.' — Successful publication of 'Götz.' — Amusing offer of a bookseller. — Unrest and extravagancies of the age. — General want of faith. — Letters to Kestner and Charlotte. — Coquetting with suicide. — Suicide of Jerusalem. — State of Goethe's mind. — Marriage of Charlotte to Kestner. — Marriage of Cornelia. — Goethe meditates a drama on Mahomet. — Marriage of Maximiliane Laroche with Brentano. — Dangerous intimacy. — Publication of 'Gotter, Helden und Wieland.' — First acquaintance with Karl August. — Composition of Werther . . . . .	190
---	-----

CHAPTER V.

WERTHER.

Kestner's narrative of Jerusalem's suicide. — Sensation at Wetzlar. — Character of Werther. — Distinction between Werther and Goethe. — Wretched English translation of 'Werther.' — Simplicity of the structure of the book. — Its prodigious effect. — Objections of Lessing. — Parody by Nicolai. — Nicolai at Werther's grave. — Enthusiasm of Zimmermann and Kotzebue. — Indignation of Kestner and Charlotte. — Goethe obtains their forgiveness. — Kestner's letter to Hennings . . . . .	217
--	-----

CHAPTER VI.

SURVEY OF GERMAN LITERATURE.

Goethe's contemporaries. — Idealism the dominant characteristic of German literature. — Comparison of Greek and Christian Art. — Legend of Tannhäuser and Legend of Phryne. — Nature deified by the Greek, and diabolized by the Christian. — Contrast between early Greek and early Christian art. — Realism the dominant characteristic of the Greek mind, and Idealism of the Christian. — Idealism carried furthest by German art. — German belief in witches and wizards. — Struggle between Idealism and Realism. — Predominance of Realism in the Romantic epoch. — Its strong manifestation in the Nibelungen Lied. — Contrast between national song or Volkspoesie, and poetic art Kuntspoesie.
--

— Poetry made secular by the crusades. — Realistic reaction. — Continued predominance in Germany of Idealism over Realism. — Change produced by the Reformation. — Twofold protest of the eighteenth century negative against authority, and positive in favor of Nature. — Klopstock the representative of German Idealism. — Wieland the representative of German Realism. — Lessing the real revolutionary leader of the German mind. — Herder the lineal descendant of Lessing. — Goethe the Realist, and Schiller the Idealist . . . . . 239

CHAPTER VII.

CLAVIGO.

Marriage lotteries. — Anna Sybilla Münch. — ‘Mémoire’ of Beaumarchais. — Story of Beaumarchais and Clavijo. — Goethe’s composition of ‘Clavigo.’ — Trifling character of the play . . . 268

CHAPTER VIII.

THE LITERARY LION.

Goethe’s acquaintance with Klopstock and Lavater. — Character of Lavater. — Probable parentage of Goethe’s religious opinions. — Faith and knowledge. — Acquaintance with Basedow, the education reformer. — Wild and genius-like demeanor. — Acquaintance with Jacobi. — Impressions produced by his wonderful personality. — Studies Spinoza. — Studies the history and doctrines of the Moravians. — Conceives an idea of treating epically the history of the ‘Wandering Jew.’ — Projects a play on the fable of Prometheus. — Comparison of the extant fragment with the Prometheus of Æschylus . . . . . 279

CHAPTER IX.

LILI.

Goethe’s affection for Anna Elizabeth Schönmann (Lili). — Character of Lili. — Goethe’s verses to Lili. — ‘Erwin und Elmire.’ — Objections to a marriage. — Composition of ‘Stella.’ — Canning’s caricature. — Tour in Switzerland with the two Counts Stolberg. — Separation from Lili. — ‘Lili’s Menagerie.’ — Commencement of ‘Egmont.’ — Goethe accepts Karl August’s invitation to Weimar . . . . . 302

BOOK THE FOURTH.

THE GENIALISCH PERIOD IN WEIMAR.

1775 to 1779.

CHAPTER I.

WEIMAR IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Description of Weimar. — The Wartburg. — Banqueting-hall of the Minnesingers. — Annual Meeting of the Bachs. — The Park. — Legend of the Serpent of Weimar. — Charming environs. — State of science. — Absence of comfort and luxury. — Rough and simple manners. — Prices of things. — Condition of the people. — Exclusiveness of the Court. — Goethe ennobled against his wish. — No real public for art at Weimar. — Necessity in art for the co-operation of the nation with individual genius . . . . . 319

CHAPTER II.

THE NOTABILITIES OF WEIMAR.

The Dowager Duchess Amalia. — Mdlle. Göchhausen. — Wieland. — Einsiedel. — Corona Schröter. — Bertuch. — Musæus. — Seckendorf. — The Duchess Luise. — Karl August. — Gräfin Werther. — Frau von Stein. — Knebel. — Herder . . . . . 340

CHAPTER III.

THE FIRST WILD WEEKS AT WEIMAR.

Sensation created by Goethe at Weimar. — Laxity of German morals based on sentimentalism. — Goethe's flirtations. — Skating, devilries and dissipation. — Goethe's close intimacy with Karl August. — Elected to the post of Geheime Legations Rath. — Protest of the Court silenced by the Duke. — Exaggerated scandal. — Klopstock's letter of remonstrance. — Breach between Klopstock and Goethe. — Gleim's anecdote of Goethe. — Absurdity of the charge that Goethe sacrificed his genius to the Court. — Merck's approbation of Goethe's position . . . . . 351

CHAPTER IV.

THE FRAU VON STEIN.

Charlotte, Baroness Von Stein. — Goethe falls in love with her. — His letters . . . . . 369

CHAPTER V.

THE GARTENHAUS.

Dedication of the Garden House to the Frau von Stein. — Transferred by the Duke from Bertuch to Goethe. — The favorite retreat of Goethe. — Goethe's fondness for fresh air and water. — His ballad of 'The Fisherman.' — His appearance in the character of a water-sprite . . . . . 375

CHAPTER VI.

PRIVATE THEATRICALS.

Goethe's useful influence with the Duke, and efforts to improve the people of Weimar. — Popularity of private theatricals. — Open air performances. — Representation of 'Minerva's Birth, Life and Deeds.' — Goethe's operetta 'Die Fischerin.' — Miscellaneous performances. — Representation of the 'Iphigenia.' — Goethe's acting. — General amusements and occupations . . . . . 381

CHAPTER VII.

MANY-COLORED THREADS.

Goethe's love and ambition. — Letters from sentimental youths. — Composition of 'Triumph der Empfindsamkeit.' — Journey to the Harz mountains in disguise. — Interview with Plessing, the misanthrope. — Suicide of Fräulein von Lassberg. — Goethe's increased hatred of Wertherism. — Representation of the 'Triumph der Empfindsamkeit' . . . . . 392

CHAPTER VIII.

THE REAL PHILANTHROPIST.

Goethe's manifold employments and studies. — His love of the people. — His contempt for the Prussian Court. — Frederic the Great. — Goethe's kindness. — His delicate benevolence to Kraft — His letters to Kraft. — Strange charge, that Goethe was cold and heartless. — Menzel's attacks. — Goethe's loveable nature, 405

APPENDIX . . . . . 425

BOOK THE FIRST.

THE CHILD IS FATHER TO THE MAN.

---

1749 to 1765.

---

Vom Vater hab' ich die Statur,
Des Lebens ernstes Führen ;
Von Mütterchen die Frohnatur,
Und Lust zu fabuliren.

Hätte Gott mich anders gewollt,
So hätt' er mich anders gebaut.

BOOK THE FIRST.

---

CHAPTER I.

PARENTAGE.

QUINTUS CURTIUS tells us that, in certain seasons, Bactria was darkened by whirlwinds of dust, which completely covered and concealed the roads. Left thus without their usual landmarks, the wanderers awaited the rising of the stars, —

‘To light them on their dim and perilous way.’

May we not say the same of Literature? From time to time its pathways are so obscured beneath the rubbish of the age, that many a footsore pilgrim complains of the hidden route. In such times let us imitate the Bactrians; let us cease to look upon the confusions of the day, and turning our gaze upon the great Immortals who have gone before, seek guidance from their light. In all ages the biographies of great men have been fruitful in lessons. In all ages they have been powerful stimulants to a noble ambition. In all ages they have been regarded as the armories wherein are gathered the weapons with which great battles have been won.

There may be some among my readers who will dispute Goethe's claim to greatness. They will admit that he was a great poet, but deny that he was a great man. In denying it, they will set forth the qualities which constitute their ideal of greatness, and finding him deficient in some of these qualities, declare his title null. But in awarding him that title, I do not mean to imply that he was an ideal man; I do not present him as the exemplar of all greatness. No man can be such an exemplar. Humanity reveals itself in fragments. One man is the carrier of one kind of excellence, another of another. Achilles wins the victory, and Homer immortalizes it: we bestow the laurel-crown on both. In virtue of a genius such as modern times have only seen equalled once or twice, Goethe deserves the epithet of great; (unless we believe a great genius can belong to a small mind.) Nor is it in virtue of genius alone that he deserves the name. Merck said of him, that what he lived was more beautiful than what he wrote; and his Life, amid all its weaknesses and all its errors, presents a picture of a certain grandeur of soul, which cannot be contemplated unmoved. I shall make no attempt to conceal his faults. Let them be dealt with as harshly as severest justice may dictate, they will not eclipse the central light which shines throughout his life. He was great, if only in large-mindedness — a magnanimity which admitted no trace of envy, of pettiness, of ignoble feeling to stain or to distort his thoughts. He was great, if only in his lovingness, simplicity, benevolence. He was great, if only in his gigantic activity. He was great, if only in self-mastery, which subdued rebellious impulses into the direct path prescribed by his will and reason. 'This man, we may say, became morally great, by being in his own age what in some other ages many might have been, a genuine man. His grand excellency was this, that he was genuine. As his primary faculty, the foundation of all others, was Intellect, depth and force of Vision; so his primary virtue was Justice, was the courage to be just. A giant's strength we admired in him; yet strength ennobled into softest mildness. The greatest of hearts was also the bravest; fearless, unwearied, peacefully invincible.*

The following pages will, it is hoped, furnish evidence for such a judgment, and help to dissipate the many misconstructions which darken the glory of the life of Germany's greatest son.

The hereditary transmission of qualities is one among the many physiological problems still far from a solution; and the parentage of genius is one of the most difficult aspects of that problem, although usually treated by writers with a very light hand, especially when their facile progress is unimpeded by any perplexing weight of knowledge. Definite ignorance rides swiftly over a field, where indefinite knowledge painfully picks its way. The maternal influence is popularly credited with the preponderance. 'All remarkable men have remarkable mothers,' is a current saying. But this hasty and empirical generalization is no truer than such generalizations usually are. It is disproved by fact. It is disproved by what is known of hereditary transmission. It leads also to this fatal conclusion, namely, that if the mother had the preponderating influence over the organization of the child, the race would be in perpetual degeneration; just as the white man's superior organization is gradually lost when a few white men intermarry with a preponderating black race. The whole question of hereditary transmission is at present beyond the scope of science. We know that form, feature, temperament, idiosyncrasy, acquired habit, diseases, anomalies of structure, and duration of life, are transmitted to offspring ; but the law of transmission is still hidden from us.* Certain qualities are transmitted from parents to children in so direct a manner as to strike the least observant eye ; on the other hand it often happens that the transmitted quality is masked by the presence of some different quality, and only reappears in the second or third generation. New combinations also take place. Still we can say with safety that whenever a child exhibits any remarkable aptitude we may detect that aptitude in one or both of his parents or grandparents.

Thus it is that observation detects families illustrious through several generations ; and families also which, through many generations, transmit idiocy and imbecility.† That ‘talent runs in families’ we are taught by examples, such as the ‘wit of the Sheridans’ and the ‘esprit des Mortemarts.’ Nor am I aware of any musical genius springing from a family in which during two generations musical aptitude was not remarkable. It is necessary to include two generations, because, among the curious phenomena of hereditariness there is the phenomenon of atavism, in which children resemble their ancestors, but do not resemble their progenitors.‡

* The reader curious on this curious subject is referred to the large work of Dr. Lucas, De l'Hérédité Naturelle (Paris, 1847-50), or the work of Girou de Buzareingues, De la Génération (Paris, 1828), in which are recorded the results of numerous experiments on the breeding of animals.

† Haller : Elementa Physiologiæ, vol. viii, p. 92. Aristotle seems to have had a glimpse of the law of transmission ; De Partibus Animalium, i, p. 4, ed. Bekker.

‡ See, besides the works already named, Burdach : Physiologie, ii, p. 269 ; and Longet : Traité de Physiol., ii, 133.

But popular experience declares that the children of men of genius are dunces: how is this to be reconciled with the doctrine of hereditariness? A decisive answer cannot be given; but we may suggest that there is some confusion inevitably arising from the exaggerated demands made upon the children of a man of genius; and from our not taking into account the rarity of genius as a phenomenon, which rarity points to a peculiarity in the confluence of circumstances not likely to be transmitted. I am not so certain that these much decried children have been dunces. If they have seemed insignificant when compared with their fathers, they would have been estimated quite otherwise had their position been otherwise; and the man who, bearing an illustrious name, seems unworthy of the burthen, would be lauded by biographers as a man of considerable merit, had he been the father instead of the son of a genius.*

There is consequently a philosophic interest aiding a natural curiosity in the inquiry into Goethe's ancestry. That he had inherited his organization and tendencies from his forefathers, and could call nothing in himself original, he has told us in these verses:

‘Vom Vater hab’ ich die Statur,
Des Lebens ernstes Führen;
Von Mütterchen die Frohnatur,
Und Lust zu fabuliren.
Urahn herr war der Schönsten hold,
Das spukt so hin und wieder;
Urahn frau liebte Schmuck und Gold,
Das zuckt wohl durch die Glieder.

* In our own day, Byron, Coleridge, and Leigh Hunt, were the fathers of children remarkable even among the remarkable: and Shelley's son has faculties which would have distinguished any one bearing a less onerous name.

Sind nun die Elemente nicht,
 Aus dem Complex zu trennen,
 Was ist denn an dem ganzen Wicht
 Original zu nennen ? ' *

The first glimpse we get of his ancestry is about the middle of the seventeenth century. In the Grafschaft of Mansfeld in Thuringia, the little town of Artern numbered among its scanty inhabitants a farrier, by name Hans Christian Goethe. His son, Frederick, being probably of a more meditative turn, selected a more meditative employment than that of shoeing horses. He became a tailor. Having passed an apprenticeship, (not precisely that of Wilhelm Meister,) he commenced his Wanderings, in the course of which he reached Frankfurt. Here he soon found employment, and being, as we learn, a 'ladies' man,' he soon also found a wife. The master tailor, Sebastian Lutz, gave him his daughter, on his admission to the citizenship of Frankfurt and to the guild of tailors. This was in 1687. Several children were born, and vanished ; in 1700 his wife, too, vanished, to be replaced,

* ' From my father I inherit my frame, and the steady guidance of life ; from dear little mother my happy disposition, and love of story-telling. My ancestor was a "ladies' man," and that haunts me now and then ; my ancestress loved finery and show, which also runs in the blood. If, then, the elements are not to be separated from the whole, what can one call original in the descendant ? '

This is a very inadequate translation ; but believing that to leave German untranslated is very unfair to those whose want of leisure or inclination has prevented their acquiring the language, I shall throughout translate every word cited. At the same time it is very unfair to the poet, and to the writer quoting the poet, to be forced to give translations which are after all felt not to represent the force and spirit of the original. I will do my best to give approximative translations, which the reader will be good enough to accept as such, rather than be left in the dark.

five years afterwards, by Frau Cornelia Schellhorn, a widow, blooming with six-and-thirty summers, and possessing the solid attractions of a good property; (she kept the hotel) Zum Weidenhof, where her new husband laid down the scissors, and donned the landlord's apron. He had two sons by her, and died in 1730, aged seventy-three.

One of these two sons, the younger, Johann Caspar, was the father of our poet. Thus we see that Goethe, like Schiller, sprang from the people. He makes no mention of the lucky tailor, or of the Thuringian farrier in his autobiography. This silence may be variously interpreted. At first, I imagined it was aristocratic prudery on the part of von Goethe, minister and nobleman; but it is never well to put ungenerous constructions, when others, equally plausible and more honorable, are ready; and we shall do well here to follow the advice of a thoughtful and kindly writer, to 'employ our imagination in the service of charity.' We can easily imagine that Goethe was silent about the tailor, because, in truth, having never known him, there was none of that affectionate remembrance which encircles the objects of early life, to make this grandfather figure in the autobiography beside the grandfather Textor, who was known and loved. Probably, also, the tailor was seldom talked of in the parental circle.

Johann Caspar Goethe received a good education, travelled into Italy, became an imperial councillor in Frankfurt, and married, in 1748, Katharina Elizabeth, daughter of Johann Wolfgang Textor, the chief-magistrate (Schultheiss).

The genealogical tables of kings and conquerors are thought of interest, and why should not the genealogy of our poet be equally interesting to us? In the belief that it will be so, I here subjoin it.

GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE GOETHE FAMILY.

FRIEDRICH GEORG GOETHE,

Born Sept. 7, 1657, at Artern, in the county of Mansfeld, where his father was a farrier; from 1687 a citizen and tailor in Frankfurt-on-the-Maine; married first, ANNA ELISABETH LUTZ, a tailor's daughter (died 1700); secondly, May 4, 1705, MRS. CORNELIA SCHELLHORN (born Sept. 27, 1668; buried March 28, 1754); died as keeper of the inn zum Weidenhof at Frankfurt; buried Feb. 13, 1730.

JOHANN MICHAEL GOETHE, died 1733.

JOHANN CASPAR GOETHE, born July 31, 1710; died 27 May, 1782, as Imperial Counsellor in Frankfurt; married Aug. 20, 1748, KATHARINA ELIZABETH TEXTOR (born Feb. 19, 1731; died Sept. 13, 1808).

JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE, born Aug. 28, 1749; died March 22, 1832; from July 13, 1788, lived with CHRISTIANE VULPIUS (died June 6, 1816); married her, Oct. 19, 1806.

CORNELIE FRIEDRICA CHRISTIANN born Dec. 7, 1750; died June 8, 1777, at Emmendingen; married Nov. 1, 1773, Joh. Ge. SCHLOSSER (born 1739; died 1799, at Frankfurt).

HERMANN JACOB, born Nov. 26, 1752; died Jan. 19, 1756.

KATHARINA ELIZABETH, born Sept. 8, 1754; died Jan. 19, 1756.

JOHANNA MARIA, born March 28, 1756; died Aug. 9, 1739.

GEORG ADOLF, born June 14, 1760; died Feb. 16, 1761.

JULIUS AUGUST WALTHER VON GOETHE, born Dec. 25, 1789, in Weimar; died as Privy Counsellor, Oct. 28, 1830, at Rome; married April, 1817, OTTILIE VON POGWISCH.

MARIE ANNA LUISE SCHLOSSER, born Oct. 28, 1774; died Sept. 28, 1811; married 1795, NICOLIVTUS, at Eutin (died 1839).

ELISABETH KATHARINA JULIE SCHLOSSER, born May 10, 1777, died July 5, at Emmendingen.

WALTHER WOLFGANG V. GOETHE, born Feb. 1818.

WOLFGANG MAX. V. GOETHE, born Sept. 18, 1820.

ALMA V. GOETHE, born Oct. 1827.

1844

GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE TEXTOR FAMILY.

GEORG WEBER,

Citizen of Weickersheim, a small town in the Jaxt district, near Mergentheim.

WOLFGANG WEBER,

Counsellor at Hohenlohe, and Director of the Chancery at Neuenstein ; according to the custom of the time, translated his family name, WEBER into Latin, and called himself TEXTOR.

JOHANN WOLFGANG TEXTOR.

Born at Neuenstein ; until 1690, Vice Court Judge and President-Vicar at the Electoral Court of Justice at Heidelberg ; afterwards Consul and First Syndic at Frankfurt ; died there Dec. 27, 1701.

CHRISTOPH HEINRICH TEXTOR, Counsellor of Justice and Advocate to the Elector Palatine ; died 1716.

JOHANN NICOLAUS TEXTOR, Colonel and City Commandant ; married 1737, a widow von BARCKHAUSEN, born von KLETTENBERG.

JOHANN WOLFGANG TEXTOR, born Dec. 12, 1693 ; died Feb. 6, 1771, as Imperial Counsellor and Magistrate at Frankfurt ; married ANNA MARGARETHA LINDHEIMER, daughter of DR CORNELIUS LINDHEIMER, Procurator of the Imperial Chamber of Justice at Wetzlar, born July 31, 1711 ; died April 15, 1783.

KATHARINA ELISABETH, born Feb. 19, 1731 ; died Sept. 13, 1808 ; married Aug. 20, 1748, the father of the Poet, Counsellor

JOHANNA MARIA, born 1734 ; married Nov. 11, 1751, the druggist MELBER, in Frankfurt.

ANNA MARIA, born 1738 ; married Nov. 2, 1756, the clergyman M. STARR, in Frankfurt.

JOHANN JOST, born 1739 ; died September 19, 1792, as Sheriff in Frankfurt.

ANNA CHRISTINA, born Oct. 24, 1743.

GOETHE.

Goethe's father was a cold, stern, formal, somewhat pedantic, but truth-loving, upright-minded man. He hungered for knowledge, and, although in general of a laconic turn, freely imparted all he learned. In his domestic circle his word was law. Not only imperious, but in some respects capricious, he was nevertheless greatly respected, if little loved, by wife, children, and friends. He is characterized by Krause as ein geradliniger Frankfurter Reichsbürger — 'a [straightforward] Frankfurt citizen,' whose habits were as measured as his gait. From him the poet inherited the well-built frame, the erect carriage, and the measured movement which in old age became stiffness, and was construed into diplomacy or haughtiness; from him also came that orderliness and stoicism which have so much distressed those who cannot conceive genius otherwise than as vagabond in its habits. The (lust) for knowledge, the delight in communicating it, the almost pedantic attention to details, which are noticeable in the poet, are all traceable in the father.

The mother was more like what we conceive as the proper parent for a poet. She is one of the pleasantest figures in German literature, and one standing out with greater vividness than almost any other. Her simple, hearty, joyous, and affectionate nature endeared her to all. She was the delight of children, the favorite of poets and princes. To the last retaining her enthusiasm and simplicity, mingled with great shrewdness and knowledge of character, Frau Aja, as they christened her, was at once grave and hearty, dignified and simple. She had read most of the best German and Italian authors, had picked up considerable desultory information, and had that 'mother wit' which so often seems to render culture superfluous. ~~in women~~, their rapid intuitions anticipating the tardy conclusions of experience — a characteristic also of the poetic mind. Her letters are full of spirit: not always strictly grammatical; not irreproachable in orthography; but vigorous (with vivacity.) After a lengthened interview with her, an enthusiastic traveller exclaimed, 'Now do I understand how Goethe has become the man he is!'* Wieland, Merck, Bürger, Madame de Stael, Karl August, and other great people sought her acquaintance. The Duchess Amalia corresponded with her as with an intimate friend; (a letter from her was a small jubilee) at the Weimar Court. She was married at seventeen, to a man for whom she had no love, and was only eighteen when the poet was born.† This, instead of making her prematurely old, seems to have perpetuated her girlhood. 'I and my Wolfgang,' she said, 'have always held fast to each other, because we were both young together.' To him she transmitted her love of story-telling, her animal spirits, her love of everything which bore the stamp of distinctive individuality, and her love of seeing happy faces around her. 'Order and quiet,' she says in one of her charming letters to Freiherr von Stein, 'are my principal characteristics. Hence I despatch at once whatever I have to do, the most disagreeable always first, and I gulp down the devil without looking at him. When all has returned to its proper state, then I defy any one to surpass me in good humor.' Her heartiness and tolerance are the causes, she thinks, why every one likes her. 'I am fond of people, and that every one feels directly — young and old. I pass without pretension through the world, and that gratifies men.) I never bemoralize any one — always seek out the good that is in them, and leave what is bad to him who made mankind, and knows how to round off the * Ephemeriden der Literatur, quoted in Nicolovius über Goethe.

† Lovers of parallels will be glad to be reminded that Napoleon's mother was only eighteen when the hero of Austerlitz was born.

angles. In this way I make myself happy and comfortable.' Who does not recognize the son in those accents? The kindest of men inherited his loving, happy nature, from the heartiest of women.

He also inherited from her his dislike of unnecessary agitation and emotion; ~~and~~ that deliberate avoidance of all things capable of disturbing ~~her~~ ~~in~~ ~~him~~ peace of mind, which, ~~in~~ ~~him~~, has been construed as coldness. Her sunny nature shrank from storms. She stipulated with her servants that they were not to trouble her with afflicting news, except upon some positive necessity for the communication. In 1805, when her son was dangerously ill at Weimar, no one ventured to speak to her on the subject. Not until he had completely recovered did she voluntarily enter on it. 'I knew it all,' she remarked, 'but said nothing. Now we can talk about him without my feeling a stab every time his name is mentioned.'

In this voluntary insulation from disastrous intelligence, there is something so antagonistic to the notorious craving for excitement felt by the Teutonic races, something so unlike the morbid love of intellectual drams — the fierce alcohol of emotion — with which ~~we~~ we intoxicate ourselves, that it is no wonder if Goethe has on this account been accused of insensibility. Yet, in truth, a very superficial knowledge of his nature suffices to show that it was not from coldness he avoided indulgence in the 'luxury of ~~wee~~.' It was ~~no~~ want of sympathy, ~~but~~ ~~excess~~ excess of sensibility. His delicate ~~(nerves)~~ shrank from the wear and tear of excitement. That which to coarser natures would have been a stimulus, to him was a disturbance. It is, doubtless, the instinct of our emotional nature to seek such stimulants; but his reason was strong enough to keep this instinct under control. Falk relates that when Goethe heard he had looked upon Wieland in death, 'and thereby procured myself a miserable evening and worse night, he vehemently reprov'd me for it. Why, said he, should I suffer the delightful impression of the features of my friend to be obliterated by the sight of a disfigured mask? I carefully avoided seeing Schiller, Herder, or the Duchess Amalia, in the coffin. I, for my part, desire to retain in my memory a picture of my departed friends more full of soul than the mere mask can furnish me.'

This subjection of the instinct of curiosity to the dictates of reason is not coldness. There is danger indeed of carrying it too far, and thus coddling the mind. Into this extreme neither Goethe nor his mother can be said to have fallen. At any rate, let the reader pronounce what judgment ~~on it~~ he thinks fit, it is right that he should at the outset distinctly understand it to be a characteristic of the poet.) The self-mastery it implies forms the keystone of his character. In him ~~(the emotive)~~ <sup>the sensitive</sup> was subjected to the ~~intellectual~~ <sup>intellectual</sup> man. | He was 'king over himself.' | He, as he tells us, found men eager enough to lord it over others, while indifferent whether they could rule themselves —

'Das wollen alle Herren seyn,
Und keiner ist Herr von sich!'

(He made it his study to subdue into harmonious unity the rebellious impulses which incessantly threatened the supremacy of reason. Here, on the threshold of his career, let attention be called to this cardinal characteristic: his footsteps were not guided by a light tremulous in every gust, liable to fall to the ground amid the hurrying agitation of vulgar instincts, but a torch grasped by an iron Will, and lifted high above the currents of those lower gusts, shedding a continuous steady gleam across the troubled path. I do not say he never stumbled. At times the clamorous agitation of rebellious passions misled

as it mislead others

him, for he was very human, often erring; but viewing his life as it disposes itself into the broad masses necessary for a characteristic appreciation, I say that in him, more than in almost any other man of his time, naked vigor of resolution, moving in alliance with steady clearness of intellect, produced a self-mastery of the very highest kind.*

This he owed partly to his father and partly to his mother. It was from the latter he derived those (leading principles) which determined the movement and orbit of his artistic nature: ~~the~~ joyous, healthy temperament, humor, ~~vivid~~ fancy, susceptibility, ~~and~~ the marvellous insight which gathered up the scattered and vanishing elements of experience into new and living combinations.

* 'All I have had to do I have done in kingly fashion,' he said: 'I let tongues wag as they pleased. What I saw to be the right thing that I did.' I admire you Goethe were in him Creative, owing to

CHAPTER II.

THE PRECOCIOUS CHILD.

JOHANN WOLFGANG GOETHE was born on the 28th August, 1749, as the clock sounded the hour of noon, in the busy town of Frankfurt-on-the-Maine. The busy town, as may be supposed, was quite heedless of what was then passing in the corner of that low, heavy-beamed room in the Grosse Hirsch Graben, where an infant, black and almost lifeless, was watched with agonizing anxiety — an anxiety dissolving into tears of joy, as the aged grandmother exclaimed to the pale mother: ‘Räthin, er lebt!’ he lives!’ But if the town was heedless, not so were the stars, (as) astrologers (will certify); the stars knew who was gasping for life beside his trembling mother, and in solemn convocation they prefigured his future greatness. Goethe, with a grave smile, notes this conjunction of the stars; (as Condivi, in his Vita di Michelagnolo, does of his hero, without a smile.) out

Whatever the stars may have betokened, this August, 1749, was a momentous month to Germany, if only because it gave birth to the man whose influence has been greater than that of any man since Luther. A momentous month in very momentous times. It is the middle of the eighteenth century: a period when the movement (carried out by) Luther was passing from religion to politics, and freedom of thought was translating itself into liberty of act. From theology the movement had communicated itself to philosophy, morals and politics. The agitation was still mainly in the higher classes, but it was gradually descending to the lower. A period of deep unrest, big with events which would (distend) the conceptions of all men, and bewilder some of the wisest. A few random glances at the 'notables' may serve to call up something like the historical presence of the epoch.

In that month of August, Madame du Châtelet, the learned and pedantic Uranie of Voltaire, died in childbed, leaving him without a companion, and without a counsellor to prevent his going to the court of Frederick the Great. In that year Rousseau was seen in the brilliant circle of Mad. d'Epinay, discussing with the Encyclopedists, declaiming eloquently on the sacredness of maternity, and going home to cast his new-born infant into the basket of the Foundling Hospital. In that year Samuel Johnson was toiling manfully over his English dictionary; Gibbon was at Westminster, trying with unsuccessful diligence to master the Greek and Latin rudiments; Goldsmith was delighting the Tony Lumpkins of his district, and the 'wandering bear-leaders of genteeler sort,' with his talents, and enjoying that 'careless idleness of fireside and easy chair,' and that 'tavern excitement of the game of cards, to which he looked back so wistfully from his first hard London struggles.'* In that year Buffon, whose scientific greatness Goethe was one of the first to perceive, (and whose influence has been so profound,) produced the first volume of his Histoire Naturelle. In that year Mirabeau and Alfieri were tyrants in their nurseries, and Marat was an innocent boy of five, toddling about in the Val de Travers, untroubled by phantoms of 'les aristocrats.'

* Forster's Life and Adventures of Oliver Goldsmith, p. 29.

address was Balthazar John Hunter at

This was the period in which Goethe was born. Of the city — Frankfurt — he has given us a loving picture. No city in Germany seems so well fitted for the birthplace of this cosmopolitan poet. It was rich in speaking memorials of the past, remnants of old German life, lingering echoes of the voices which sounded through the middle ages : memorials, such as the town within a town, the fortress within a fortress, the walled cloisters, the various symbolical ceremonies still preserved from feudal times, the Jews' quarter, so picturesque, so filthy, and so strikingly significant. But if Frankfurt was thus representative of the past, it was equally representative of the present. The travellers brought there by the Rhine-stream, and by the great northern roads, made it a representative of Europe, and an Emporium of Commerce. It was thus a centre for that distinctively modern idea — Industrialism — which began, and must complete, the destruction of Feudalism. This two-fold character Frankfurt retains to the present day : the storks, perched upon the ancient gables of the past, look down upon the varied bustle of Fairs held by modern Commerce in the ancient streets.

The feeling for antiquity, and especially for old German life, which his native city would thus picturesquely cultivate, was rivalled by a feeling for Italy and its splendors, which was cultivated under the paternal roof. His father had lived in Italy, and had retained an inextinguishable delight in all its beauties. His walls were hung with architectural drawings and views of Rome ; and the poet was thus familiar from infancy with the Piazza del Popolo, St. Peter's, the Coliseum, and other centres of grand associations. Typical of his own nature and strivings is this conjunction of the Classic and the German — the one lying nearest to him, in homely intimacy, the other lying outside, as a mere scene he was to contemplate. Goethe was more Greek than German, but he never freed himself from German influence.

Thus much on Time and Place, the two great environments of life. Before quitting such generalities for the details of biography, it may be well to call attention to one hitherto unnoticed, viz. the moderate elevation of his social status. Placed midway between the two perilous extremes of affluence and want, his whole career received a modifying impulse from this position. He never knew adversity. This alone must necessarily have deprived him of one powerful chord which vibrates through the life of genius. Adversity, the sternest of teachers, had nothing to teach him. He never knew the gaunt companionship of Want, whispering its terrible suggestions. He never knew the necessity to conquer for himself breathing-room in the world : and thus all the feelings of bitterness, opposition, and defiance which accompany and perplex the struggle of life, were to him almost unknown, and taught him nothing of the aggressive and practical energy which these feelings develope in impetuous natures. How much of his serenity, how much of his dislike to politics may owe its origin to this ?

That he was 'the loveliest baby ever seen,' exciting admiration wherever nurse or mother carried him, and exhibiting, in swaddling clothes, the most 'wonderful intelligence,' we need no biographer to tell us. Is it not said of every baby ? But that he really was a wonderful child we have undeniable evidence, and of a kind less questionable than the statement of mothers and relatives. Specimens of his precocity will be given presently ; meanwhile, from his mother, we will hear an anecdote or two.

At three years old he could seldom be brought to play with little children, and only on the condition of their being pretty. One day, in a neighbor's house, he suddenly began to cry and exclaim, 'That black child must go away! I can't bear him!' And he howled till he was carried home, where he was slowly pacified; the whole cause of his grief being the ugliness of the child. A philosopher of a certain school might devote twenty pages of symbolical profundity to show how an innate love of the Beautiful determined this conduct in the child; but perhaps the reader would prefer silence to such philosophy.

A quick, merry little girl grew up by the boy's side. Four other children also came, but soon vanished. Cornelia was the only companion who survived, and for her his affection dated from her cradle. He brought his toys to her, wanted to feed her and attend on her, and was very jealous of all who approached her. 'When she was taken from the cradle, over which he watched, his anger was scarcely to be quieted. He was altogether much more easily moved to anger than to tears.' To the last his love for Cornelia was passionate.

His mother spoiled him somewhat. One Sunday morning, while the family is at church, Master Wolfgang finds himself in the kitchen, which looks upon the street. Boy-like, he begins to fling the crockery into the street, delighted at the smashing music which it makes, and stimulated by the approbation of the brothers Ochsenstein, who chuckle at him from over the way. The plates and dishes are flying in this way, as his mother returns: she sees the mischief with a housewifely horror melting into girlish sympathy as she hears how heartily the little fellow laughs at his escapade, and how the neighbors laugh at him.

This genial, indulgent mother employed her faculty for story-telling to his and her own delight. 'Air, fire, earth and water I represented under the forms of princesses; and to all natural phenomena I gave a meaning, in which I almost believed more fervently than my little hearers. As we thought of paths which led from star to star, and that we should one day inhabit the stars, and thought of the great spirits we should meet there, I was as eager for the hours of story-telling as the children themselves; I was quite curious about the future course of my own improvisation, and any invitation which interrupted these evenings was disagreeable. There I sat, and there Wolfgang held me with his large black eyes; and when the fate of one of his favorites was not according to his fancy, I saw the angry veins swell on his temples, I saw him repress his tears. He often burst in with, "But, mother, the princess won't marry the nasty tailor, even if he does kill the giant." And when I made a pause for the night, promising to continue it on the morrow, I was certain that he would in the meanwhile think it out for himself, and so he often stimulated my imagination. When I turned the story according to his plan, and told him that he had found out the dénouement, then was he all fire and flame, and one could see his little heart beating underneath his dress! His grandmother, who made a great pet of him, was the confidant of all his ideas as to how the story would turn out, and as she repeated these to me, and I turned the story according to these hints, there was a little diplomatic secrecy between us which we never disclosed. I had the pleasure of continuing my story to the delight and astonishment of my hearers, and Wolfgang saw with glowing eyes the fulfilment of his own conceptions, and listened with enthusiastic applause.' What a charming glimpse of mother and son!

The grandmother here spoken of lived in the same house, and when lessons were finished, away the children hurried to her room, to play. The dear old lady, proud as a grandmother, 'spoiled' them of course, and gave them many an eatable, which they would get only in her room. But of all her gifts nothing was comparable to the puppet-show with which she surprised them on the Christmas eve of 1753, and which Goethe says ‘created a new world in the house.’ The reader of Wilhelm Meister will remember with what solemn importance the significance of such a puppet-show is treated, and may guess how it would exercise the boy’s imagination.

There was also the grandfather Textor, whose house the children gladly visited, and whose grave personality produced an impression on the boy, all the deeper because a certain mysterious awe surrounded the monosyllabic dream-interpreting old gentleman. His portrait presents him in a perruque à huit étages, with the heavy golden chain round his neck, suspending a medal given him by the Empress Maria Theresa ; but Goethe remembered him more vividly in his dressing gown and slippers moving amid the flowers of his garden, weeding, training, watering ; or seated at the dinner table where on Sundays he received his guests.

The mother’s admirable method of cultivating the inventive activity of the boy, finds its pendant in the father’s method of cultivating his receptive faculties. He speaks with less approbation than it deserved of his father’s idea of education ; probably because late in life he felt keenly the deficiencies of systematic training. But the principle upon which the father proceeded was an excellent one, namely, that of exercising the intellect rather than the memory. An anecdote was dictated, generally something from every day life, or, perhaps, a trait from the life of Frederick the Great ; sometimes he selected a topic for himself. On such subjects he wrote dialogues and moral reflections in Latin and German. Many have been preserved ; and the reader will find one in the Appendix, which shows what mastery over Latin was achieved in his eighth year.* We can never be quite certain that the hand of the master is not mingled with that of the child ; but, in the first place, the very method of independence which the master throughout pursued is contrary to a supposition of his improving the exercises, and in the second place, the Latin contains too many Germanisms not to betray inexperience in the writer. Dr. Wisemann, of Frankfurt, to whom we are indebted for these exercises and compositions, written during Goethe's sixth, seventh, and eighth years, thinks there can be no doubt of their being the unassisted productions of the boy. In one of the dialogues there is a pun which proves that the dialogue was written in Latin first and then translated into German. It is this : the child is making wax figures, his father asks him why he does not relinquish such trivialities. The word used is nuces, which, meaning trivialities in a metaphorical sense, is by the boy wilfully interpreted in its ordinary sense, as nuts—‘cera nunc ludo non nucibus’—I play with wax, not with nuts. The German word nüsse means nuts simply, and has no metaphorical meaning.

One of these dialogues† is amusingly humorous and characteristic. Maximilian, a playfellow, asks Wolfgang why his parents would not have him with other guests at the feast. ‘I never trouble myself with seeking out the causes of what doesn't concern me,’ replies Wolfgang. He proposes to occupy the time, till the master appears, with Comenius or some other book ; but Maximilian rejects all such propositions.

‘Wolf. Well then, say what you propose.

Max. I hate all seriousness, and leave it to the dull dogs.

* See Appendix A.

† Published by Döring in his Goethe in Frankfurt am Main.

Wolf. You are very long in saying what you want.

Max. Look here ; we will knock our heads together.

Wolf. Far from it ! My head is not at all fitted for such sport.

Max. What matter ? let's see which is the hardest.

Wolf. Let us leave that game to the goats : with them it's natural. —

Max. We shall by such practice get hard heads.

Wolf. That would be no such honor ! I prefer keeping mine soft.

Max. How do you mean ?

Wolf. I don't want to be pig-headed. —

Max. There you're right ; but I prize toughness in my limbs.

Wolf. If nothing but that, then knock your head boldly against the wall, as often as you like, you will see the most wonderful effects !'

Beside this let us place one of his moral reflections. ' Horatius and Cicero were indeed Heathens, yet more sensible than many Christians ; for the one says silver is baser than gold, gold than virtue ; and the other says nothing is so beautiful as virtue. Moreover, many Heathens have surpassed Christians in virtue. Who was truer in friendship than Damon ? more generous than Alexander ? more just than Aristides ? more abstinent than Diogenes ? more patient than Socrates ? more humane than Vespasian ? more industrious than Apelles and Demosthenes ? ' Platitudes these, doubtless ; but they are platitudes which serve many as the ripe maxims of age. They give us a notion of the boy being somewhat ' old-fashioned,' and they show great progress in culture. His progress in Greek was remarkable, as may be seen from the sample given elsewhere.* Italian he learned by listening to his father while teaching Cornelia. He pretended to be occupied with his own lesson, and caught up all that was said. French, too, he learned, as the exercises testify ; and thus before he is eight, we find him writing German, French, Italian, Latin, and Greek.

* See Appendix B.

He was in fact a precocious child. This will probably startle many readers, especially if they have adopted the current notion that precocity is a sign of disease, and that marvellous children are necessarily evanescent fruits which never ripen, early blossoms which wither early. Observatum fere est celerius occidere festinatam maturitatem, says Quintilian, in the mournful passage which records the loss of his darling son; and many a proud parent has seen his hopes frustrated by early death, or by matured mediocrity following the brilliant promise. It may help to do away with some confusion on this subject, if we bear in mind that men distinguish themselves by receptive capacity and by productive capacity: they learn, and they invent. In men of the highest class these two qualities are united. Shakespeare and Goethe are not less remarkable for the variety of their knowledge than for the potency of their invention. But as we call both the child 'clever' who learns his lessons rapidly, and the child 'clever' who shows wit, sagacity, and invention, this ambiguity of phrase has led to surprise when the child who was 'so clever' at school, turns out a mediocre man; or, inversely, when the child who was a 'dunce' at school, turns out a genius in art.

Goethe's precocity was nothing abnormal. It was the activity of a mind at once greatly receptive and greatly productive. Through life he manifested the same eager desire for knowledge, not in the least alarmed by that bugbear of 'knowledge stifling originality,' which alarms the ignorance of many questionable geniuses. He knew that if abundant fuel stifles miserable fires, it makes the great fire blaze.

'Ein Quidam sagt: "Ich bin von keiner Schule;
Kein Meister lebt mit dem ich buhle;

Auch bin ich weit davon entfernt
Dass ich von Todten was gelernt.”
Dass heisst, wenn ich ihn recht verstand :
“ Ich bin ein Narr auf eigne Hand ! ” * *

In the summer of 1754 the old house was entirely rebuilt, Wolfgang officiating at the ceremony of laying the foundation, dressed as a little bricklayer. The quick, observant boy found much in this rebuilding of the paternal house to interest him ; he chatted with the workmen, learning their domestic circumstances, and learning something of the builder's art, which in after years so greatly occupied him. This event, moreover, led to his being sent to a friend during the restoration of the upper part of the house — for the family inhabited the house during its reconstruction, which was made story by story from the ground upwards — and the event also led to his being sent to school.

Viehoff thinks that Germany would have had a quite other Goethe had the child been kept at a public school till he went to the university ; and quotes Gervinus to the effect that Goethe's home education prevented his ever thoroughly appreciating history, and the struggles of the masses. Not accepting the doctrine that Character is formed by Circumstance, I cannot accept the notion of school life affecting the poet to this extent. We have only to reflect how many men are educated at public schools

* An exquisite epigram, which may be rendered thus :

A Quidnunc boasting said : ‘ I follow none ;
I owe my wisdom to myself alone ;
To neither ancient nor to modern sage
Am I indebted for a single page.’
To place this boasting in its proper light :
The Quidnunc is — a Fool in his own Right !

without there imbibing a love of history and sympathy with the masses, to see that Goethe's peculiarities must have had some other source than home education. That source lay in his character.

One thing, however, he did learn at school, and that was disgust at schools. The boy carefully trained at home, morally as well as physically, had to mingle with schoolboys who were what most schoolboys are, — dirty, rebellious, cruel, low in their tastes and habits. The contrast was very painful to him, and he was glad when the completion of his father's house once more enabled him to receive instruction at home.

One school anecdote he relates, well illustrates his power of self-command. Fighting during school time was always severely punished. One day the teacher did not arrive at the appointed time. The boys played together till the hour was nearly over, and then three of them, left alone with Wolfgang, resolved to drive him away. They cut up a broom, and re-appeared with the switches. 'I saw their design, but I at once resolved not to resist them till the clock struck. They began pitilessly lashing my legs. I did not stir, although the pain made the minutes terribly long. My wrath deepened with my endurance, and on the first stroke of the hour I grasped one of my assailants by the hair and hurled him to the ground, pressing my knee on his back; I drew the head of the second, who attacked me behind, under my arm and nearly throttled him; with a dexterous twist I threw the third flat on the ground. They bit, scratched and kicked. But my soul was swelling with one feeling of revenge, and I knocked their heads together without mercy. A shout of murder brought the household round us. But the scattered switches and my bleeding legs bore witness to my story.'

CHAPTER III.

EARLY EXPERIENCES.

It is profoundly false to say that 'Character is formed by Circumstance,' unless the phrase, with unphilosophic equivocation, include the whole complexity of Circumstances, from the creation downwards. Character is to outward Circumstance what the Organism is to the outward world : living in it, but not specially determined by it. A wondrous variety of vegetable and animal organisms live and flourish under circumstances which furnish the means of living, but do not determine the specific forms of each organism. In the same way various Characters live under identical Circumstances, excited by them, not formed by them. Each Character assimilates, from surrounding Circumstance, that which is by it assimilable, rejecting the rest ; just as from the earth and air the plant draws those elements which will serve it as food, rejecting the rest. Every Biologist knows that Circumstance has a modifying influence ; but he also knows that these modifications are only possible within certain limits. Abundance of food and peculiar treatment will modify the ferocity of a wild beast ; but it will not make the lion a lamb. I have known a cat, living at a mill, from abundance of fish food, take spontaneously to the water ; but the cat was distinctively a cat, and not an otter, although she had lost her dread of water.

Instead, therefore, of saying that Man is the creature of Circumstance, it would be nearer the mark to say that Man is the architect of Circumstance. It is Character which builds an existence out of Circumstance. Our strength is measured by our plastic power. From the same materials one man builds palaces, another hovels, one warehouses, another villas; bricks and mortar are mortar and bricks, until the architect can make them something else. Thus it is that in the same family, in the same circumstances, one man rears a stately edifice, while his brother, vacillating and incompetent, lives forever amid ruins: the block of granite which was an obstacle on the pathway of the weak, becomes a stepping-stone on the pathway of the strong.

If the reader agrees with this conception of the influence of circumstances, he will see that I was justified in laying some stress on Goethe's social position, though I controverted Viehoff and Gervinus on the point of school education. The continued absence of Want is one of those permanent and powerful conditions which necessarily modify a character. The well-fed lion loses his ferocity. But the temporary and incidental effect of school education, and other circumstances of minor importance, can never be said to modify a character; they only more or less facilitate its development.

Goethe furnishes us with a striking illustration of the degree in which outward circumstances affect character. He became early the favorite of several eminent painters, was constantly in their ateliers, playing with them, and making them explain their works to him. He was, moreover, a frequent visitor at picture sales and galleries, till at last his mind became so familiarized with the subjects treated by artists, that he could at once tell what historical or biblical subject was represented in every painting he saw. Indeed, his imagination was so stimulated by familiarity with these works, that in his tenth or eleventh year he wrote a description of twelve possible pictures on the history of Joseph, and some of his conceptions were thought worthy of being executed by artists of renown. It may be further added, in anticipation, that during the whole of his life he was thrown much with painters and pictures, and was for many years tormented with the desire of becoming an artist. If, therefore, Circumstance had the power of forming Character, we ought to find him a painter. What is the fact? The fact is, that he had not the Character which makes a painter; he had no faculty, properly speaking, for plastic art, and years of labor, aided by the instruction and counsel of the best masters, were powerless to give him even a respectable facility. All, therefore, that Circumstance did in this case, was to give his other faculties the opportunity of exercising themselves in art; it did not create the special faculty required. Circumstance can create no faculty: it is food, not nutrition; opportunity, not character.

Other boys, besides Goethe, heard the Lisbon earthquake eagerly discussed; but they had not their religious doubts awakened by it, as his were awakened in his sixth year. This catastrophe, which, in 1755, spread consternation over Europe, he has described as having greatly perturbed him. The narratives he heard of a magnificent capital suddenly smitten — churches, houses, towers, fallen with a crash — the bursting land vomiting flames and smoke — and sixty thousand souls perishing in an instant — shook his faith in the beneficence of Providence. ‘God, the creator and preserver of heaven and earth,’ he says, ‘whom the first article of our creed declared to be so wise and benignant, had not displayed paternal care in thus consigning both the just and the unjust to the same destruction.

In vain my young mind strove to resist these impressions. It was impossible ; the more so as the wise and religious themselves could not agree upon the view to be taken of the event.'

At this very time Voltaire was agitating the same doubts.

'Direz-vous, en voyant cet amas de victimes :
Dieu s'est vengé, leur mort est le prix de leur crimes ?
Quel crime, quelle faute ont commis ces enfans
Sur le sein maternel écrasés et sanglans ?
Lisbonne qui n'est plus, eût-elle plus de vices Que Londres, que Paris, plongés dans les délices ?
Lisbonne est abîmée ; et l'on danse à Paris.'

We are not, however, to suppose that the child rushed hastily to such a conclusion. He debated it in his own mind as he heard it debated around him. Bettina records that on his coming one day from church, where he had listened to a sermon on the subject, in which God's goodness was justified, his father asked him what impression the sermon had made. 'Why,' said he, 'it may after all be a much simpler matter than the clergyman thinks ; God knows very well that an immortal soul can receive no injury from a mortal accident.'

Doubts once raised would of course recur, and the child began to settle into a serious disbelief in the benignity of Providence, learning to consider God as the wrathful Deity depicted by the Hebrews. This was strengthened by the foolish conduct of those around him, who, on the occasion of a terrible thunderstorm which shattered the windows, dragged him and his sister into a dark passage, 'where the whole household, distracted with fear, tried to conciliate the angry Deity by frightful groans and prayers.' Many children are thus made sceptics ; but in a deeply reflective mind such thoughts never long abide, at least not under the influences of modern culture, which teaches us that Evil is essentially a narrow finite thing, thrown into remotest obscurity by any comprehensive view of the Infinite ; and that any amount of evil massed together from every quarter must be held as small compared with the broad beneficence of Nature.

The doubts which troubled Wolfgang gradually subsided. In his family circle he was the silent reflective listener to constant theological debates. The various sects separating from the established church all seemed to be animated by the one desire of approaching the Deity, especially through Christ, more nearly than seemed possible through the ancient forms. It occurred to him that he, also, might make such an approach, and in a more direct way. Unable to ascribe a form to the Deity, he ‘ resolved to seek Him in His works, and in the good old Bible fashion, to build an altar to Him.’ For this purpose he selected some types, such as ores and other natural productions, and arranged them in symbolical order on the elevations of a music stand ; on the apex was to be a flame typical of the soul’s aspiration, and for this a pastille did duty. Sunrise was awaited with impatience. The glittering of the house tops gave signal ; he applied a burning-glass to the pastille, and thus was the worship consummated by a priest of seven years old, alone in his bedroom ! *

Lest the trait just cited should make us forget that we are tracing the career of a child, it may be well to recall the anecdote related by Bettina, who had it from his mother. It will serve to set us right as to the childishness. One day his mother, seeing him from her window cross the street with his comrades, was amused with the gravity of his carriage, and asked laughingly, if he meant thereby to distinguish himself from his companions. The little fellow replied, 'I begin with this. Later on in life I shall distinguish myself in far other ways.'

* A similar anecdote is related of himself by that strange Romancist, once the idol of his day, and now almost entirely forgotten, Restif de la Bretonne. See Les Illuminés, par Gérard de Nerval.

On another occasion, he plagued her with questions as to whether the stars would perform all they had promised at his birth. 'Why,' said she, 'must you have the assistance of the stars, when other people get on very well without?' 'I am not to be satisfied with what does for other people!' said the juvenile Jupiter.

He had just attained his seventh year when the Seven Years' War broke out. His grandfather espoused the cause of Austria, his father that of Frederick. This difference of opinion brought with it contentions, and finally separation between the families. The exploits of the Prussian army were enthusiastically cited on the one side and depreciated on the other. It was an all-absorbing topic, awakening passionate partisanship. Men looked with strange feelings on the struggle which the greatest captain of his age was maintaining against Russia, Austria and France. The ruler of not more than five millions of men was fighting unaided against the rulers of more than a hundred millions; and, in spite of his alleged violation of honor, it was difficult to hear without enthusiasm of his brilliant exploits. Courage and genius in desperate circumstances always awaken sympathy; and men paused not to ask what justification there was for the seizure of Silesia, nor why the Saxon standards drooped heavily in the churches of Berlin. The roar of victorious cannon stunned the judgment; the intrepid general was blindly worshipped. The Seven Years' War became a German epos. Archenholtz wrote its history; and this work, translated into Latin, was read in schools, in company with Tacitus and Cæsar.

Here again was a Circumstance from which, as it is thought, Goethe ought to have received some epic inspiration. He received from it precisely that which was food to his character. He caught the grand enthusiasm, but, as he says, it was the personality of the hero, rather than the greatness of his cause, which made him rejoice in every victory, copy the songs of triumph and the lampoons directed against Austria. He learnt now the effects of party spirit. At the table of his grandfather he had to endure galling sarcasms, and vehement declamations showered on his hero. He heard Frederick ‘shamefully slandered.’ ‘And as in my sixth year, after the Lisbon earthquake, I doubted the beneficence of Providence, so now, on account of Frederick, I began to doubt the justice of the world.’

Over the doorway of the house in which he was born was a Lyre and a Star, announcing, as every interpreter will certify, that a Poet was to make that house illustrious. The poetic faculty early manifested itself. We have seen him inventing conclusions for his mother’s stories ; and as he grew older he began to invent stories for the amusement of his playfellows, after he had filled his mind with images —

‘Lone sitting on the shores of old Romance.’

He had read the Orbis Pictus, Ovid’s Metamorphoses, Homer’s Iliad in prose, Virgil in the original, Telemachus, Robinson Crusoe, Anson’s Voyages, with such books as Fortunatus, The Wandering Jew, The Four Sons of Aymon, etc. He also read and learned by heart most of the poets of that day : Canitz, Hagedorn, Drollinger, Gellert, Haller, &c. — writers then much beloved, now slumbering upon dusty shelves, unvisited except by an occasional historian, and by spiders of an inquiring mind.

Not only did he tell stories, he wrote them also, as we gather from a touching little anecdote preserved by Bettina. The small-pox had carried off his little brother Jacob. To the surprise of his mother, Wolfgang shed no tears, believing Jacob to be with God in heaven. ‘Did you not love your little brother, then,’ asked his mother, ‘that you do not grieve for his loss?’ He ran to his room, and from under the bed drew a quantity of papers on which he had written stories and lessons. ‘All these I had written that I might teach them to him,’ said the child. He was then nine years old.

Shortly after the death of his brother he was startled by the sound of the warder’s trumpet from the chief tower, announcing the approach of troops. This was in January 1759. It seemed as if the warder never would cease blowing his sounding horn. On came the troops in continuous masses, and the rolling tumult of their drums called all the women to the windows, all the boys in admiring crowds into the streets. The troops were French. They seized the guard-house, and in a little while the city was a camp. To make matters worse, these troops were at war with Frederick, whom Wolfgang and his father worshipped. They were soon billeted through the town, and things relapsed into their usual routine, varied by a military occupation. In the Goethe-house an important person was quartered, — Count de Thorane, the King’s lieutenant, a man of taste and munificence, who assembled round him artists and celebrities, and won the affectionate admiration of Wolfgang, though he failed to overcome the hatred of the old councillor.

This occupation of Frankfurt brought with it many advantages to Goethe. It relaxed the severity of paternal book education, and began another kind of tuition — that of life and manners. The perpetual marching through the streets, the brilliant parades, the music, the ‘pomp, pride, and circumstance’ were not without their influence. Moreover, he now gained conversational familiarity with French,* and acquaintance with the theatre. The French nation always carries its ‘civilization’ with it — i. e., a café and a theatre. In Frankfurt both were immediately opened, and Goethe was presented with a ‘free admission’ to the theatre, a privilege he used daily, not always understanding but always enjoying what he saw. In tragedy the measured rhythm, slow utterance, and abstract language enabled him to understand the scenes, better than he understood comedy, wherein the language, besides moving amid the details of private life, was also more rapidly spoken. But at the theatre boys are not critical, and do not need to understand a play to enjoy it.† A Racine, found upon his father’s shelves, was eagerly studied, and the speeches were declaimed with more or less appreciation of their meaning.

The theatre, and acquaintance with a chattering little braggart, named Derones, gave him such familiarity with the language, that in a month he surprised his parents with his facility. This Derones was acquainted with the actors, and introduced him behind the 'scenes.' At ten years of age to go 'behind the scenes' means a great deal. We shall see hereafter how early he was introduced behind the scenes of life. For the present let it be noted that he was a frequenter of the green-room, and admitted into the dressing-room, where the actors and actresses dressed and undressed with philosophic disregard to appearances, which, from repeated visits, he also learned to regard as quite natural.

* He says that he had never learned French before ; but this is erroneous, as his exercises prove.

† Well do I remember, as a child of the same age, my intense delight at the French theatre, although certainly no three consecutive phrases could have been understood by me. Nay, so great was this delight, that although we regarded the French custom of opening theatres on Sunday, with the profoundest sense of its ‘wickedness,’ the attraction became irresistible : and one Sunday night, at Nantes, my brother and I stole into the theatre with pricking consciences. To this day I see the actors gesticulating, and hear the audience cry bis ! bis ! redemanding a couplet (in which we joined with a stout British encore !) ; and to this day I remember how we laughed at what we certainly understood only in passing glimpses. Goethe’s ignorance of the language, then, I am sure was no obstacle to his enjoyment.

A grotesque scene took place between these two boys. Derones excelled as he affirmed in 'affairs of honor.' He had been engaged in several, and had always managed to disarm his antagonist, and then nobly forgive him. One day he pretended that Wolfgang had insulted him : satisfaction was peremptorily demanded, and a duel was the result. Imagine Wolfgang, aged twelve, arrayed in shoes and silver buckles, fine woollen stockings, dark serge breeches, green coat, with gold facings, a waistcoat of gold cloth, cut out of his father's bridegroom-waistcoat, his hair curled and powdered, his hat under his arm, and little sword with silk sabretash. This little mannikin stands opposite his antagonist with theatrical formality ; swords clash, thrusts come quick upon each other, the combat grows hot, when the point of Derones' rapier lodges in the hilt of Wolfgang's : hereupon the French boy, with great magnanimity, declares that he is satisfied ! The two embrace, and retire to a café to refresh themselves with a glass of almond milk.*

Theatrical ambition, which stirs us all, soon prompted Wolfgang. As a child he had imitated Terence ; he was now to make a more elaborate effort in the style of Piron. When the play was completed he submitted it to Derones, who, pointing out several grammatical blunders, promised to examine it more critically, and talked of giving it his support with the manager. Wolfgang saw, in his mind's eye, the name of his play already placarded at the corners of the streets ! Unhappily Derones in his critical capacity was merciless. He picked the play to pieces, and stunned the poor author with the critical jargon of that day ; proclaimed the absolute integrity of the Three Unities, abused the English, laughed at the Germans, and maintained the sovereignty of French taste in so confident a style, that his listener was without a reply. If silenced, however, he was not convinced. It set him thinking on those critical canons. He studied the treatise on the Unities by Corneille, and the prefaces of Racine. The result of these studies was profound contempt for that system ; and it is, perhaps, to Derones that we owe something of the daring defiance of all ' rule,' which startled Germany in Götz von Berlichingen.

* To remove incredulity, it may be well to remind the reader that to this day German youths fight out their quarrels with swords — not fists.

CHAPTER IV.

VARIOUS STUDIES.

At length, June 1761, the French quitted Frankfurt; and studies were seriously resumed. Mathematics, music, and drawing were commenced under paternal superintendence. For mathematics Wolfgang had no aptitude; for music little: he learned to play on the harpsichord, and, subsequently, on the violoncello, but he never attained any proficiency. Drawing continued through life a pleasant exercise.

Left now to the calm of uninterrupted studies he made gigantic strides. Even the hours of recreation were filled with some useful occupation. He added English to his polyglott store; and to keep up his several languages, determined, like the late Ducrow, 'to ride six horses at once.' Thus he invented a Romance, wherein six or seven brothers and sisters scattered over the world corresponded with each other. The eldest describes in good German all the incidents of his travels; his sister answers in womanly style with short sharp sentences, and nothing but full stops, much as Siegwart was afterwards written. Another brother studies theology, and therefore writes in Latin, with postscripts in Greek. A third and a fourth, clerks at Hamburgh and Marseilles, take English and French; Italian is given to a musician; while the youngest, who remains at home, writes in Jew-German.

This romance led him to a more accurate study of geography. Having placed his characters in various parts of the globe, he was not satisfied till he had a distinct idea of these localities, so that the objects and events should be consonant with probability. While trying to master the strange dialect — Jew-German — he was led to the study of Hebrew. As the original language of the Old Testament, this seemed to him an indispensable acquisition. His father consented to give him a Hebrew master ; and although he attained no scholarship in that difficult language, yet the reading, translating, and committing to memory of various parts of the Bible, brought out the meaning more vividly before him ; as every one will understand who compares the lasting effect produced by the laborious school reading of Sallust and Livy, with the facile reading of Robertson and Hume. The Bible made a profound impression upon him. To a boy of his constitutional reflectiveness, the severe study of this book could not fail to exercise a deep and permeating influence ; nor, at the same time, in one so accustomed to think for himself, could it fail to awaken certain doubts. ‘The contradiction,’ he says, ‘between the actual or possible, and tradition, forcibly arrested me. I often posed my tutors with the sun standing still on Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon ; not to mention other incognuities and impossibilities. All my doubts were now awakened, as in order to master the Hebrew I studied the literal version by Schmidt, printed under the text.’

One result of these Hebrew studies was a biblical poem on Joseph and his Brethren ; which he dictated to a poor half idiot who lived in his father’s house, and who had a mania for copying or writing under dictation. Goethe soon found the process of dictation of great service ; and through life it continued to be his favorite mode of composition. All his best thoughts and expressions, he says, came to him while walking ; he could do nothing seated.

Connected with his biblical studies, and his Confirmation which took place in 1763, we catch a glimpse of Fräulein von Klettenberg, whose letters and conversations subsequently furnished him with the 'Confessions of a Fair Saint' in Wilhelm Meister.* Her influence was avowedly very great, both now and subsequently. It was not so much the effect of religious discussion, as the experience it gave him of a deeply religious nature. She was neither bigot nor prude. Her faith was an inner light which shed mild radiance around her. Moved by her influence, he wrote a series of Religious Odes, after the fashion of that day, and greatly pleased his father by presenting them copied neatly in a quarto volume. His father begged that every year he would present him with such a volume.

A very different sort of female influence has now to be touched on. His heart began to flutter with the emotions of love. He was not quite fifteen, when Gretchen, the sister of one of his disreputable companions, first agitated his imagination with her charms. The story is told in a rambling way in the Autobiography, and may here be very briefly dismissed. He had often turned his poetical talents to practical purposes, namely, writing wedding and funeral verses, the produce of which went in joyous feastings. He was thus almost daily thrown with Gretchen ; but she, though kind, treated him as a child, and never permitted the slightest familiarity. A merry life they led, in picnics and pleasure bouts ; and the coronation of the Kaiser Joseph II. (so circumstantially narrated by him), was the occasion of increased festivity. One night, after the fatigues of a sight-seeing day, the hours rolled unheeded over these thoughtless, merry heads, and the stroke of midnight startled them. To his dismay, Wolfgang found he had forgotten the door-key with which hitherto he had been able to evade paternal knowledge of his late hours. Gretchen proposed they should all remain together, and pass the night in conversation. This was agreed on. But, as in all such cases, the effort was vain. Fatigue weighed down their eyelids ; conversation became feebler and feebler ; two strangers already slumbered in corners of the room ; one friend sat in a corner with his betrothed, her head reposing on his shoulder ; another crossing his arms upon the table, rested his head upon them — and snored. The noisy room had become silent. Gretchen and her lover sat by the window talking in undertones. Fatigue at length conquered her also, and drooping her head upon his shoulder she too slept. With tender pride he supported that delicious burden, till, like the rest, he gave way and slept.

* In Varnhagen von Ense's Vermischte Schriften (vol. iii. p. 33), the reader will find a few significant details respecting this remarkable person and some of her poems. (I cannot pass this reference to my oldest German friend without a word of acknowledgment for the unwearying kindness he has ever shown me, and the many ways in which he has assisted me in this biography.)

It was broad day when he awoke. Gretchen was standing before a mirror arranging her cap. She smiled on him more amiably than ever she had smiled before ; and pressed his hand tenderly as he departed. But now, while he seemed drawing nearer to her, the dénouement was at hand. Some of the joyous companions had been guilty of nefarious practices, such as forgeries of documents. His friend and Gretchen were involved in the accusation, though falsely. Wolfgang had to undergo a severe investigation, which, as he was perfectly innocent, did not much afflict him ; but an affliction came out of the investigation, for Gretchen in her deposition concerning him said, ‘I will not deny that I have often seen him, and seen him with pleasure, but I treated him as a child, and my affection for him was merely that of a sister.’ His exasperation may be imagined. A boy aspiring to the dignity of manhood knows few things more galling than to be treated as a boy by the girl whom he has honored with his homage. He suffered greatly at this destruction of his romance; nightly was his pillow wet with tears; food became repugnant to him; life had no more an object.

But pride came to his aid; pride and that volatility of youth which compensates for extra sensitiveness by extra facility in forgetting. He threw himself into study, especially of philosophy, under guidance of a tutor, a sort of Wagner to the young Faust. This tutor, who preferred dusty quartos to all the landscapes in the world, used to banter him upon being a true German, such as Tacitus describes, avid of the emotions excited by solitude and scenery. Laughter weaned him not from the enjoyment. He was enjoying his first sorrow: the luxury of melancholy, the romance of a forlorn existence, drove him into solitude. Like Bellerophon he fed upon his own heart, away from the haunts of men, ‘Ορ θυμὸς κατεδῶν, πατόν ἀνθρώπων ἀλλεϊνών.

He made frequent walking excursions. Those mountains which from earliest childhood had stood so distant, ‘haunting him like a passion,’ were now his favorite resorts. He visited Homburg, Kronburg, Königstein, Wiesbaden, Schwalbach, Biberich, etc. These filled his mind with lovely images, and became poems.

Severer studies were not neglected. To please his father he was diligent in application to jurisprudence; to please himself he was still more diligent in literature : Morhof's Polyhistor, Gessner's Isagoge, and Bayle's Dictionary, filled him with a new ambition — to become an University Professor ! Herein, as indeed throughout his career, we see the strange impressionability of his nature, which, like the fabled chameleon, takes its color from every tree it lies under.

The melancholy fit did not last long. A circle of lively friends, among them Horn, of whom we shall hear more anon, drew him into gayety again. Their opinion of his talents appears to have been enormous ; their love for him and interest in all he did, was like that which followed him through life. No matter what his mood — in the wildest student-period, in the startling genius-period, and in the diplomatic-period ; whatever offence his manner created was soon forgotten in the irresistible fascination of his nature. The secret of that fascination was his own overflowing lovingness, and his genuine interest in every individuality, however opposite to his own.

With these imperfect glances at his early career we close this Book, on his departure from home for the University of Leipsic. Before finally quitting this period, we may take a survey of the characteristics it exhibits, as some guide in our future inquiries.

CHAPTER V.

THE CHILD IS FATHER TO THE MAN.

As in the soft round lineaments of childhood we trace features which after years will develope into decisive forms, so in the moral lineaments of the Child may be traced the characteristics of the Man. But I have often thought that an apparent 'solution of continuity' takes place in the transition period, so that the youth is in many respects unlike what he has been in childhood, and what he will be in maturity. In youth, when the passions begin to stir, the character is made to swerve from the orbit previously traced. Passion, more than Character, rules the hour. Thus we often see the prudent child turn out an extravagant youth; but he crystallizes once more into prudence, as he hardens into age.

This was certainly the case with Goethe, who, if he had died young, like Shelley or Keats, would have left a name among the most genial, not to say enthusiastic, of poets; but who, living to the age of eighty-two, had fifty years of crystallization to form a character which perplexes critics. In his childhood, scanty as the details are which enable us to reconstruct it, we see the main features of the man. Let us glance rapidly at them.

And first of his manysidedness. Seldom has a boy exhibited such completeness of human faculties. The multiplied activity of his life is prefigured in the varied tendencies of his childhood. We see him as an orderly, somewhat formal, inquisitive, reasoning, deliberative child, a precocious learner, an omnivorous reader, and a vigorous logician who thinks for himself — so independent that at six years of age he doubts the beneficence of the Creator; at seven, doubts the competence and justice of the world's judgment. He is inventive, poetical, proud, loving, volatile, with a mind open to all influences, swayed by every gust, and yet, while thus swayed as to the direction of his activity, master over himself. The most diverse characters, the most antagonistic opinions interest him. He is very studious, no 'bookworm' more so: alternately busy with languages, mythology, antiquities, law philosophy, poetry and religion; yet he joins in all festive scenes, gets familiar with Life in various forms, and stays out late o' nights. He is also troubled by a melancholy, dreamy mood, forcing him ever and anon into solitude.

Among the dominant characteristics, however, are seriousness, formality, rationality. He is by no means a naughty boy. He gives his parents no tremulous anxiety as to 'what will become of him.' He seems very much master of himself. It is this which in later years perplexed his judges, who could not reconcile this appearance of self-mastery, this absence of enthusiasm, with their conceptions of a poet. Assuredly he had enthusiasm, if ever man had it: at least, if enthusiasm (being 'full of the God') means being filled with a divine idea, and by its light working steadily. He had little of the other kind of enthusiasm — the insurrection of the Feelings carrying away upon their triumphant shoulders the Reason which has no longer power to guide them; for his intellect did not derive its main momentum from his feelings. And hence it is that whereas the quality which first strikes us in most poets is sensibility, with its caprices, infirmities, and generous errors, the first quality which strikes us in Goethe — the Child and Man, but not the Youth — is intellect, with its clearness, calmness, and provoking immunity from error. I say provoking, for we all gladly overlook the errors of enthusiasm; some, because these errors appeal to our compassion, and some, because these errors establish a community of impulse between the sinner and ourselves, forming, as it were, broken edges which show us where to look for support — scars which tell of wounds we have escaped. Whereas, we are pitiless to the successes of reason, the cold prudences which shame our weakness and ask no alms from our charity. Why do we all preach Prudence and dislike it? Perhaps, because we dimly feel that life without its generous errors might want its lasting enjoyments; and thus the very mistakes which arise from an imprudent, unreflecting career, are absolved by that instinct which suggests other aims for existence beyond prudential aims. This is one reason why the erring lives of Genius command such deathless sympathy.

Having indicated so much, I may now ask those who are distressed by the calm, self-sustaining superiority of Goethe in old age, whether, on deeper reflection, they cannot reconcile it with their conceptions of the poet's nature? We preach Reason, but we sympathize with Sensibility. Our dislike of the one arises from its supposed incompatibility with the other. But if a man unites the mastery of Will and Intellect to the profoundest sensibility of Emotion, shall we not say of him that he has in living synthesis vindicated both what we preach and what we love? That Goethe united these will be abundantly shown in this Biography. In the chapters about to follow we shall see him wild, restless, aimless, erring, and extravagant enough to satisfy the most ardent admirer of the vagabond period of genius : the Child and the Man are at times scarcely traceable in the Youth.

One trait must not be passed over, namely, his impatient susceptibility, which, while it prevented his ever thoroughly mastering the technic of any one subject, lay at the bottom of his multiplied activity in directions so opposed to each other. He was excessively impressionable, caught the impulse from every surrounding influence, and was thus never constant to one thing, because this susceptibility was connected with an impatience which soon made him weary. There are men who learn many languages, and never thoroughly master the grammar of one. Of these was Goethe. Easily excited to throw his energy in a new direction, he had not the patience which begins at the beginning, and rises gradually, slowly into assured mastery. Like an eagle he swooped down upon his prey ; he could not watch for it, with cat-like patience. It is to this impatience we must attribute the fact of so many works being left fragments, so many composed by snatches during long intervals. Prometheus, Mahomet, Die Natürliche Tochter, Elpenor, Achilleis, Nausikaa, etc., remain fragments. Faust, Egmont, Tasso, Iphigenia, Meister, etc., were long years in hand. Whatever could be done in a few days — while the impulse lasted — was done ; longer works were spread over a series of years.

BOOK THE SECOND.

STUDENT DAYS.

---

1765 to 1771.

---

‘ In grossen Städten lernen früh Die jüngsten Knaben was ;
Denn manche Bücher lesen sie
Und hören diess und dass ;
Vom Lieben und vom Küssen
Sie brauchen’s nicht zu wissen ;
Und mancher ist im zwölften Jahr
Fast klüger als sein Vater war
Da er die Mutter nahm.’

‘ Æser taught me that the Ideal of Beauty is Simplicity and Repose, and thence it follows that no youth can be a Master.’

BOOK THE SECOND.

---

CHAPTER I.

THE LEIPSIC STUDENT.

IN the month of October 1765, Goethe, aged sixteen, arrived in Leipsic, to commence his collegiate life, and to lay, as he hoped, the solid foundation of a future professorship. He took lodgings in the Feuerkugel, between the Old and New Markets, and was by the rector of the University inscribed on the 19th as student 'in the Bavarian nation.' At that period, and until quite recently, the University was classed according to four 'Nations,' viz., the Meissnisch, the Saxon, the Bavarian, and the Polish. Goethe, as a Frankfurter, was placed in the Bavarian.*

If the reader has any vivid recollection of the Leipsic chapters in the Autobiography, let me beg him to dismiss it with all haste from his mind ; the calm narrative of his Excellency J. W. von Goethe very inaccurately represents the actual condition of the raw, wild student, just escaped from the paternal roof, with money which seems * Otto Jahn, in the Briefe an`Leipziger Freunde, p. 9.

“unlimited in his purse, with the world before him as an oyster which his genius is to open.” His own letters, and the letters of his friends, enable us ‘to read between the lines’ of the Autobiography, and to read there a very different account.

He first presented himself to Hofrath Böhme, a genuine German professor, shut within the narrow circle of his speciality. To him Literature and the Fine Arts were trivialities; and when the confiding youth confessed his secret ambition of studying belles lettres, in lieu of the jurisprudence commanded by his father, he met with every discouragement. Yet it was not difficult to persuade this impressionable student that to rival Otto and Heineccius was the true ambition of a vigorous mind. He set to work in earnest, at first, as students usually do on arriving at seats of learning. His attendance at the lectures on philosophy, history of law, and jurisprudence, was assiduous enough to have pleased even his father. But this flush of eagerness quickly subsided. Logic was invincibly repugnant to him. He hungered for realities, and could not be satisfied with definitions. To see operations of his mind which, from childhood upwards, had been conducted with perfect ease and unconsciousness, suddenly pulled to pieces, in order that he might gain the superfluous knowledge of what they were, and what they were called, was to him tiresome and frivolous. ‘I fancied I knew as much about God and the world as the professor himself, and logic seemed in many places to come to a dead standstill.’ We are here on the threshold of that experience which has been immortalized in the scene between Mephistopheles and the Student. Jurisprudence soon became almost equally tiresome. He already knew as much law as the professor thought proper to communicate; and what with the tedium of the lectures, and the counter-attraction of delicious 'fritters,' which used to come 'hot from the pan precisely at the hour of lecture,' no wonder if volatile Sixteen soon abated attendance.

Volatile he was, wild, and somewhat rough, both in appearance and in speech. He had brought with him a wild, uneasy spirit struggling towards the light. He had also brought with him the rough manners of Frankfurt, the strong provincial accent, and provincial colloquialisms, rendered still more unfit for the Leipsik salon by a mixture of proverbs and biblical allusions. Nay, even his costume was in unpleasant contrast with that of the society in which he moved. He had an ample wardrobe, but unhappily it was doubly provincial; it had been manufactured at home by one of his father's servants, and thus was not only in the Frankfurt style, but grotesquely made in that style. To complete his discomfiture, he saw a favorite low comedian throw an audience into fits of laughter by coming on the stage dressed precisely in that costume, which he had hitherto worn as the latest novelty! All who can remember the early humiliations of being far behind their companions in matters of costume, will sympathize with this youth. From one of his letters, written shortly after his arrival, we may catch a glimpse of him. 'To-day I have heard two lectures: Böhme on law, and Ernesti on Cicero's Orator. That'll do, eh? Next week we have collegium, philosophicum et mathematicum. I haven't seen Gottsched yet. He is married again. She is nineteen and he sixty-five. She is four feet high, and he seven feet. She is as thin as a herring, and he as broad as a feathersack. I make a great figure here! But as yet I am no dandy. I never shall become one. I need some skill to be industrious. In society, concerts, theatre, feastings, promenades, the time flies. Ha! it goes gloriously. But also expensively. The devil knows how my purse feels it. Hold! rescue! stop! see'st thou that they leave off flying? There go two louis d'or. Help! there goes another. Heavens! another couple are gone. Pence are here as farthings are with you. Nevertheless one can live cheaply here. So I hope to get off with two hundred thalers — what do I say? with three hundred. N. B. Not including what has already gone to the devil.'

Dissatisfied with College, he sought instruction elsewhere. At the table where he dined daily, kept by Hofrath Ludwig the rector, he met several medical students. He heard little talked of but medicine and botany, and the names of Haller, Linnæus and Buffon, were incessantly cited with respect. His ready quickness to interest himself in all that interested those around him, threw him at once into these studies, which hereafter he was to pursue with passionate ardor, but which at present he only lightly touched. Another source of instruction awaited him, one which through life he ever gratefully acknowledged, the society of women.

' Willst du genau erfahren was sich ziemt
So frage nur bei edlen Frauen an! ' *

So he speaks in Tasso, and here, in Leipsic, he was glad to learn from Frau Böhme not only some of the requisites for society, but also some principles of poetic criticism. This delicate, accomplished woman was able to draw him into society, to teach him l'ombre and picquet, to correct some of his provincialisms, and lastly to make him own that the poets he admired were a deplorable set, and that his own imitations of them deserved no better fate than the flames. He had got rid of his absurd wardrobe at one fell swoop, without a murmur at the expense. He now had also to cast away the poetic wardrobe brought from home with so much pride. He saw that it was poetic frippery — saw that his own poems were lifeless ; accordingly, a holocaust was made of all his writings, prose and verse, and the kitchen fire wafted them into space.

* ' Wouldst clearly learn what the Becoming is, inquire of noble-minded women.'

But society became vapid to him at last. He was not at his ease. Cards never amused him, and poetical discussion became painful. ‘I have not written a long while,’ he writes to his friend Riese. ‘Forgive me. Ask not after the cause ! It was not occupation, at all events. You live contented in Marburg ; I live so here. Solitary, solitary, quite solitary. Dear Riese, this solitude has awakened a certain sadness in my soul : —

It is my only pleasure,
Away from all the world,
To lie beside the streamlet, .
And think of those I love.

But contented as I am, I still feel the want of old companions. I sigh for my friends and my maiden, and when I feel that my sighs are vain, —

Then fills my heart with sorrow, —
My eye is dim ;
The stream which softly passed me,
Roars now in storm.
No bird sings in the bushes,
The zephyr which refreshed me
Now storms from the north,
And whirls off the blossoms.
With tremor I fly from the spot, —
I fly, and seek in deserted streets
Sad solitude. .

Yet how happy I am, quite happy ! Horn has drawn me from low spirits by his arrival. He wonders why I am so changed.

He seeks to find the explanation,
Smiling thinks o'er it, looks me in the face ;
But how can he find out my cause of grief?
I know it not myself.

But I must tell you something of myself :

Quite other wishes rise within me now,
Dear friend, from those you have been wont to hear.
You know how seriously I wooed the Muse ;
With what a hate I scorned those whom the Law
And not the Muses beckoned. And you know How fondly I (alas ! most falsely) hoped
The Muses loved me, — gave me gift of song !
My Lyre sounded many a lofty song,
But not the Muses, nor Apollo sent them.
True, it is my pride made me believe
The Gods descended to me, and no Master Produced more perfect works than mine !
No sooner came I here, than from my eyes
Fell off the scales, as I first learned to prize Fame, and the mighty efforts fame required.
Then seemed to me my own ambitious flight
But as the agitation of a worm,
Who in the dust beholds the eagle soar,
And strives to reach him ; strains every nerve Yet only agitates the dust he lies in.
Sudden the wind doth rise, and whirls the dust
In clouds, the worm is also raised with it :
Then the poor worm believes he has the wings
Of eagles, raising him too in the air !
But in another moment lulls the wind,
The cloud of dust drops gently on the ground,
And with the dust the worm, who crawls once more !

Don't be angry with my galimathias. Good bye. Horn will finish this letter.'

Not only is this letter curious in its revelations of his state of mind, but the verses into which it spontaneously flows, and which I have translated with more jealous fidelity to the meaning than to poetical reproduction, show how among his friends he was even then regarded as a future poet. The confession uttered in the final verses, clearly owes its origin to Frau Böhme's criticisms; but it is not every young poet who can be so easily discouraged. Even his discouragement could not last long. Schlosser, afterwards his brother-in-law, came to Leipsic, and by his preaching and example once more roused the productive activity which showed itself in German, French, English and Italian attempts.

Schlosser, who was ten years his senior, not only awakened emulation by his own superior knowledge and facility, but further aided him by introducing him to a set of literary friends, where poetic discussions formed the staple of conversation. This circle met at the house of one Schönkopf, a Weinhändler and Hauswirth, living in the Brühl, No. 79. To translate these words into English equivalents would only mislead the reader. Schönkopf kept neither an hotel, nor a public house, but what in Germany is a substitute for both. He sold wine, and kept a table d'hôte; occasionally also let bedrooms to travellers. His wife, a lively, cultivated woman, belonging to a noble family in Frankfurt, drew Frankfurt visitors to the house; and with her Goethe soon became on terms of intimacy, which would seem surprising to the English reader who only heard of her as an innkeeper's wife. He became 'one of the family,' and fell in love with the daughter. I must further beg the reader to understand that in Germany, to this day, there is a wide difference between the dining customs and our own. The English student, clerk or bachelor, who dines at an eating house, chop house, or hotel, goes there simply to get his dinner, and perhaps look at the Times. Of the other diners he knows nothing, cares little. It is rare that a word is interchanged between him and his neighbor. Quite otherwise in Germany. There the same society is generally to be found at the same table. The table d'hôte is composed of a circle of habitués, varied by occasional visitors, who in time become, perhaps, members of the circle. Even with strangers conversation is freely interchanged; and in a little while friendships are formed over these dinner tables, according as natural tastes and likings assimilate, which, extending beyond the mere hour of dinner, are carried into the current of life. Germans do not rise so hastily from the table as we; for time with them is not so precious; life is not so crowded; time can be found for quiet after-dinner talk. The cigars and coffee, which appear before the cloth is removed, keep the company together; and in that state of suffused comfort which quiet digestion creates, they hear without anger the opinions of antagonists. In such a society must we imagine Goethe in the Schönkopf establishment, among students and men of letters, all eager in advancing their own opinions, and combating the 'false taste' which was not their own.

To complete this picture, and to separate it still more from our English customs, you must imagine host and hostess dining at the table, while their charming daughter, who had cooked or helped to cook the dinner, brought them the wine. This daughter was the Anna Katharina, by intimates called Käthchen, and by Goethe, in the Autobiography, designated as Annchen and Annette. Her portrait, still extant, is very pleasing. She was then nineteen, lively, and loving; how could she be insensible to the love of this glorious youth, in all the fervor of genius, and with all the attractions of beauty? They saw each other daily, not only at dinner, but in the evenings, when he accompanied the piano of her brother by a feeble performance on the flute. They also got up private theatricals, in which Goethe and Käthchen played the lovers. Minna von Barnhelm, then a novelty, was among the pieces performed. That these performances were of a strictly amateur order, may be gathered from the fact that in one of them the part of a nightingale, which is important, was represented by a handkerchief, rolled up into such ornithological resemblance as art could reach.

Two letters, quite recently discovered, have fallen into my hands; they give us a curious glimpse of him at this time, such as one may look for in vain in his own account of himself, or in the accounts of any other writer. They are from his friend Horn, whose arrival he mentioned in the letter previously quoted, and who was one of his daily companions in Frankfurt. The first is dated 12th of August, 1766, and is addressed to one Moors, a Frankfurt companion.

‘To speak of our Goethe! He is still the same proud, fantastic personage as when I came hither. If you only saw him you would either be mad with anger, or you would burst with laughter. I cannot at all understand how a man can so quickly transform himself. His manners and his whole bearing, at present, are as different as possible from his former behavior. Over and above his pride, he is a dandy; and all his clothes, handsome as they are, are in so odd a taste, that they make him conspicuous among all the students. But this is indifferent to him; one may remonstrate with him for his folly as much as one likes —

Man mag Amphion seyn und Feld und Wald bezwingen, Nur keinen Goethe nicht kann man zur Klugheit bringen.*

All his thought and effort is only to please himself and his lady-love. In every circle he makes himself more ridiculous than agreeable. Merely because the lady admires it, he has put on tricks and gestures that one cannot possibly refrain from laughing at. He has adopted a walk which is quite insufferable. If you only saw it !

‘Il marche à pas comptés,
Comme un Recteur suivi des quatre Facultés.’

His society is every day more intolerable to me, and he, too, tries to avoid me whenever he can. I am too plain a man for him to walk across the street with me. What would the ‘king of Holland’ say if he saw him in this guise ? Do write again to him soon and tell him your opinion ; else he and his lady-love will remain as silly as ever. Heaven only preserve me, as long as I am here, from any sweetheart, for the women here are the very devil. Goethe is not the first who has made a fool of himself to please his Dulcinea. I only wish you could see her just for once ; she is the most absurd creature in the world. Her mine coquette avec un air hautain is all with which she has bewitched Goethe. Dear friend ! How glad should I be if Goethe were still what he was in Frankfurt ! Good friends as we were formerly, we can now scarcely endure each other for a quarter of an hour. Yet with time I still hope to convert him, though it is a hard matter to make a coxcomb wise. But I will venture everything for the sake of it.

* One may be Amphion and coerce the trees and rocks, but not bring Goethe to his senses.

Ach ! fruchtete dies mein Bemühn !
Ach ! konnt' ich meinen Zweck erreichen !
Ich wollt' nicht Luther, nicht Calvin, Noch einem der Bekehrer weichen.*

I cannot write to him again what I have here told you. I shall be delighted if you will do so. I care neither for his anger nor for that of his lady-love. For, after all, he is not easily offended with me ; even when we have quarrelled he sends for me the next day. So much of him ; more another time. Live and forget not thy

‘ HORN.’

Moors followed Horn's advice, and expressed to Goethe, apparently in very plain terms, his astonishment and dissatisfaction at the disadvantageous change. In October of the same year, he received from Horn the following explanation :

‘ But dear Moors ! How glad you will be to learn that we have lost no friend in our Goethe, as we falsely supposed. He had so travestied himself as to deceive not only me but a great many others, and we should never have discovered the real truth of the matter, if your letter had not threatened him with the loss of a friend. I must tell you the whole story as he himself told it to me, for he has commissioned me to do so in order to save him the trouble. He is in love, it is true — he has confessed it to me, and will confess it to you ; but his love, though its circumstances are sad, is not culpable, as I formerly supposed. He loves. But not that young lady whom I suspected him of loving. He loves a girl beneath him in rank, but a girl whom — I think I do not say too much — you would love yourself if you saw her. I am no lover, *Ah, if my attempt succeed, I should not envy Luther, Calvin, nor any other Converter.

so I shall write entirely without passion. Imagine to yourself a woman well-grown, though not very tall ; a round, agreeable, though not extraordinarily beautiful face ; open, gentle, engaging manners ; a very pretty understanding, without having had any great education. He loves her very tenderly, with the perfect, honest intentions of a virtuous man, though he knows that she can never be his. Whether she loves him in return I know not. You know, dear Moors, that is a point about which one cannot well ask ; but this much I can say to you, that they seem to be born for each other. Now observe his cunning ! That no one may suspect him of such an attachment, he undertakes to persuade the world of precisely the opposite, and hitherto he has been extraordinarily successful. He makes a great parade, and seems to be paying court to a certain young lady of whom I have told you before. He can see his beloved and converse with her at certain times without giving occasion for the slightest suspicion, and I often accompany him to her. If Goethe were not my friend I should fall in love with her myself. Meanwhile he is supposed to be in love with the Fräulein — (but what do you care about her name?) and people are fond of teasing him about her. Perhaps she herself believes that he loves her, but the good lady deceives herself. Since that time he has admitted me to closer confidence, has made me acquainted with his affairs, and shown me that his expenditure is not so great as might be supposed. He is more of a philosopher and moralist than ever ; and innocent as his love is, he nevertheless disapproves it. We often dispute about this, but let him take what side he will, he is sure to win ; for you know what weight he can give to only apparent reasons. I pity him and his good heart, which really must be in a very melancholy condition, since he loves the most virtuous and perfect of girls without hope. But if we suppose that she loves him in return, how miserable must he be on that very account ! I need not explain that to you, who so well know the human heart. He has told me that he will write you one or two things about it himself. There is no necessity for me to recommend silence to you on this subject ; for you yourself see how necessary it is. . . . .’

Imagine this somewhat fantastic youth assured that his passion is returned, and then imagine him indulging in the boyish caprice of tormenting his beloved. There is nothing more cruel than youth ; and youthful lovers, once assured of victory, are singularly prone to indulge in the most frivolous pretexts for ‘ingeniously tormenting.’ Man loves to conquer, likes not to feel secure, Goethe says, in the piece where he dramatized this early experience :

‘Erringen will der Mensch ; er will nicht sicher seyn.’

Had Käthchen coquetted with him, keeping him in the exquisite pain of suspense, she would have been happier ; but as he said in his little poem Der Wahre Genuss, ‘she is perfect and her only fault is — that she loves me’ :

Sie ist vollkommen, und sie fehlet
Darin allein dass sie mich liebt.

He teased her with trifles and idle suspicions ; was jealous without cause, convinced without reason ; plagued her with fantastic quarrels, till at last her endurance was exhausted, and her love was washed away in tears. No sooner was he aware of this than he repented, and tried to recover the jewel which like a prodigal he had cast away. In vain. He was in despair, and tried in dissipation to forget his grief. A better issue was poetry. Several of his lyrics bore the burden of this experience : and one entire play, or pastoral, is devoted to a poetical representation of these lovers’ quarrels : this is Die Laune des Verliebten, which is very curious as the earliest extant work of the great poet, and as the earliest specimen of his tendency to turn experience into song. In the opera of Erwin und Elmire he subsequently treated a similar subject in a very different manner. The first effort is the more curious of the two. The style of composition is an imitation of those pastoral dramas, which, originated by Tasso and Guarini in the soft and almost luscious Aminta and Pastor Fido, had by the French been made popular all over Europe.

Two happy and two unhappy lovers are somewhat artificially contrasted; the two latter representing Käthchen and the poet. Action there is none; the piece is made up of talk about love, some felicitous verses of the true stamp and ring, and an occasional glimpse of insight into the complexities of passion. Eridon, the jealous lover, torments his mistress in a style at once capricious and natural; with admirable truth she deplores his jealousy and excuses it:

Zwar oft betrübt er mich, doch rührt ihn auch mein Schmerz.
Wirft er mir etwas vor, fängt er mich an zu plagen,
So darf ich nur ein Wort, ein gutes Wort nur sagen, Gleich ist er umgekehrt, die wilde Zanksucht flieht,
Er weint sogar mit mir, wenn er mich weinen sieht.*

It is admirably said that the very absence of any cause for grief prompts him to create a grief:

Da er kein Elend hat, will er sich Elend machen.

Amine is also touched with a delicate pencil. Her lov-

* 'Tis true he vexes me, and yet my sorrow pains him.
Yet let him but reproach — begin to tease me,
Then need I but a word, a single kind word utter,
Away flies all his anger in a moment,
And he will weep with me, because he sees me weep.

ingness, forgivingness, and endurance are from the life. Here is a couplet breathing the very tenderness of love :

Der Liebe leichtes Band machst du zum schweren Joch.

Du quälst mich als Tyrann ; und ich ? *ich lieb dich noch ! **

One more line and I have done : Eglé is persuading Eridon that Amine's love of dancing is no trespass on her love for him ; since, after having enjoyed her dance, her first thought is to seek him :

Und durch das Suchen selbst wirst du ihr immer lieber. †

In such touches as these lurks the future poet ; still more so in the very choice of the subject. Here, as ever, he does not cheat himself with pouring feigned sorrows into feigning verse : he embalms his own experience. He does not trouble himself with drawing characters and events from the shelves of the library : his soul is the fountain of his inspiration. His own life was uniformly the text from which he preached. He sang what he had felt, and because he had felt it ; not because others had sung before him. He was the echo of no man's joys and sorrows, he was the lyrist of his own. This is the reason why his poems have an endless charm : they are as indestructible as passion itself. They reach our hearts because they issue from his. Every bullet hits the mark, according to the huntsman's superstition, if it have first been dipped in the marksman's blood.

He has told us, emphatically, that all his works are but fragments of the grand confession of his life. Of him we may say what Horace so well says of Lucilius, that he trusted his secrets to books as to faithful friends :

* The fairy link of Love thou mak'st a galling yoke.

Thou treat'st me as a slave ; and I ? I love thee still !

† And in the very search her heart grows fonder of thee.

‘ Ille velut fidis arcana sodalibus olim
 Credebat libris ; neque, si male cesserat, unquam
 Decurrens alio, neque si bene : quo fit, ut omnia
Votiva pateat veluti descripta tabella
Vita senis.’ *

How clearly he saw the nullity of every other precedence is shown in various passages of his letters and conversations. Riemer has preserved one worth selecting : ‘ There will soon be a poetry without poetry, a real ποίησις, where the subject matter is ἐν ποιήσει, in the making : a manufactured poetry.’† He dates from Leipsic the origin of his own practice, which he says was a tendency he never could deviate from all his life : ‘ namely, the tendency to transform into an image, a poem, everything which delighted or troubled me, or otherwise occupied me, and to come to some distinct understanding with myself upon it, to set my inward being at rest.’ The reason he gives for this tendency is very questionable. He attributes it to the isolation in which he lived with respect to matters of taste forcing him to look within for poetical subjects. But had not the tendency of his genius lain in that direction, no such circumstances could have directed it.

Young, curious, and excitable as he was, nothing is more natural than that he should somewhat shock the ‘ fair respectabilities’ by his pranks and extravagances. His constant companion was Behrisch, a wayward, sarcastic devil-may-care, who, however, had some shrewd good sense, as a buttress for all his follies. Behrisch inroduced him to some damsels who 'were better than their reputation,' and took him into scenes more useful to the future poet than advantageous to the repute of the young student. He also laughed him out of all respect for gods, goddesses, and other mythological inanities which still pressed their heavy dulness on his verse; would not let him commit the imprudence of rushing into print, but calmed the author's longing by beautifully copying his verses into a volume, adorning them with vignettes. Behrisch was, so to speak, the precursor of Merck; his influence not so great, but somewhat of the same kind. The friends were displeased to see young Goethe falling thus away from 'good society' into such a disreputable course; but just as Lessing before him had neglected the 'elegant' Leipzig world for actors and authors of more wit than money, and preferred Mylius, with his shoes down at heel, to all that the best drest society could offer; so did young Goethe neglect salon and lecture-hall for the many-colored scene of life in less elegant circles. Be comforted, O reader! The poet will receive no injury from these sources; he is gaining experience, and experience even of the worst sides of human nature will be sublimated into noble uses, as carrion by the wise farmer is turned into excellent manure. In this great Drama of Life every Theatre has its Green-room; and unless the poet know how it is 'behind the scenes' he will never understand how actors speak and move.

* Sermon., lib. ii. 1.

† Briefe von und an Goethe. Herausgeg. von Riemer. 1846. What follows is untranslatable, from the play on words : ‘ Die Dichter heissen dann so, wie schon Moritz spasste, a spissando, densando, vom Dichtmachen, weil sie Alles zusammendrängen, und kommen mir vor wie eine Art Wurstmacher, die in den Darm des Hexameters oder Trimeters ihre Wort- und Sylbenfülle stopfen.’

Goethe had often been 'behind the scenes,' looking at the skeleton which stands in almost every house. His adventure with Gretchen, and its consequences, early opened his eyes to the strange gulfs which lie under the crust of society. 'Religion, morals, law, rank, habits,' he says, 'rule over the surface of social life. Streets of magnificent houses are kept clean; every one outwardly conducts himself with propriety ; but the disorder within is often only the more desolate ; and a polished exterior covers many a wall which totters, and falls with a crash during the night, all the more terrible because it falls during a calm. How many families had I not more or less distinctly known in which bankruptcy, divorce, seduction, murder, and robbery had wrought destruction ! — Young as I was, I had often, in such cases, lent my succor ; for as my frankness awakened confidence and my discretion was known, and as my activity did not shun any sacrifice — indeed rather preferred the most perilous occasions — I had frequently to mediate, console, and try to avert the storm ; in the course of which I could not help learning many sad and humiliating facts.’

It was natural that such sad experience should at first lead him to view the whole social fabric with contempt. To relieve himself of this ‘perilous stuff’ he — being then greatly captivated with Molière’s works, — sketched the plans of several dramas, but their plots were so uniformly unpleasant, and the catastrophes so tragic, that he did not work out these plans. ‘The Fellow Sinners’ (Die Mitschuldigen), is the sole piece which was completed, and it now occupies a place among his writings. Few, in England at least, ever read it ; yet it is worth a rapid glance, and is especially remarkable as the work of a youth not yet eighteen. It is lively, and strong with effective situations and two happily sketched characters, — Söller, the scampish husband, and his father-in-law, the inquisitive landlord. The plot is briefly this : Söller’s wife — before she became his wife — loved a certain Alcest ; and her husband’s conduct is not such as to make her forget her former lover, who, at the opening of the play, is residing in her father’s hotel. Alcest prevails upon her to grant him an interview in his own room, while her husband, Söller, is at the masquerade. Unluckily Söller has determined to rob Alcest that very night. He enters the room by stealth — opens the escritoire — takes the money — is alarmed by a noise — hides himself in an alcove, and then sees his father-in-law, the landlord, enter the room! The old man, unable to resist a burning curiosity to know the contents of a letter which Alcest has received that day, has come to read it in secret. But he in turn is alarmed by the appearance of his daughter, and letting the candle fall he escapes. Söller is now the exasperated witness of an interview between Alcest and his wife: a situation which, like the whole of the play, is a mixture of the ludicrous and the painful — very dramatic and very unpleasant.

On the following day the robbery is discovered. Sophie thinks the robber is her father; he returns her the compliment — nay, more, stimulated by his eager curiosity, he consents to inform Alcest of his suspicion in return for the permission to read the contents of the mysterious letter. A father sacrificing his daughter to gratify a paltry curiosity is too gross; it is the only trait of juvenility in the piece — a piece otherwise prematurely old. Enraged at such an accusation, Sophie retorts the charge upon her father, and some unamiable altercations result. The piece winds up by the self-betrayal of Söller, who, intimating to Alcest that he was present during a certain nocturnal interview, shields himself from punishment. The moral is — ‘Forget and forgive among fellow sinners.’

CHAPTER II.

MENTAL CHARACTERISTICS.

THE two dramatic works noticed towards the close of the last chapter, may be said to begin the real poetic career of their author, because in them he drew from his actual experience. They will furnish us with a text for some remarks on his peculiar characteristics, the distinct recognition of which will facilitate the comprehension of his life and writings. We make a digression, but the reader will find that in thus swerving from the direct path of narrative, we are only tacking to fill our sails with wind.

Frederick Schlegel (and after him Coleridge) aptly indicated a distinction, when he said that every man was born either a Platonist or an Aristotelian. This distinction is often expressed in the terms subjective and objective intellects. The tendency of the objective intellect is to view things directly, positively — as what they are; the tendency of the subjective intellect is to view things ideally — as what they signify to the mind. It need scarcely be added that no mind is exclusively objective or exclusively subjective, but every mind has a dominant tendency in one or the other of these directions. One man argues from Nature upwards, starting from reality, and never long losing sight of it, even in the adventurous flights of hypothesis and speculation; another argues from the Idea downwards, starting from some ideal conception, some à priori standing-point, whence reality may be reached as a sort of visible illustration, a symbol of the deeper and higher ideal existence. Plato is an avowed and explicit preacher of this latter mode of philosophizing; Aristotle is less explicitly, but decisively, of the former mode.

The Real and Ideal are thus contrasted as the termini of two opposite lines of thought. In Philosophy, in Morals and in Art, we see a constant antagonism between these two principles. Thus in Morals the Platonists are those who seek the highest morality out of human nature, instead of in the healthy development of all our tendencies, and their due co-ordination; they hope, in the suppression of integral faculties, to attain some superhuman standard. They call that Ideal which no Reality can reach, but for which we should strive. They superpose ab extra, instead of trying to develope ab intra. They draw from their own minds, or from the dogmas handed to them by tradition, an arbitrary mould, into which they attempt to fuse the organic activity of Nature.

If this school had not in its favor the imperious instinct of Progress, and aspiration after a Better, it would not hold its ground. But it satisfies that craving, and thus deludes many minds into acquiescence. The poetical and enthusiastic disposition most readily acquiesces: preferring to overlook what man is, in its delight of contemplating what the poet makes him. To such a mind all conceptions of Man must have a halo round them,—half mist, half sunshine; the hero must be a Demigod, in whom no valet de chambre can find a failing; the villain must be a Demon, for whom no charity can find an excuse.

Not to extend this to a dissertation, let me at once say that Goethe belonged to the objective class. ‘Everywhere in Goethe,’ said Franz Horn, ‘you are on firm land or island ; nowhere the infinite sea.' A better characterization was never written in one sentence. In every page of his works may be read a strong feeling for the real, the concrete, the living ; and a repugnance as strong for the vague, the abstract, or the supersensuous. His constant striving was to study Nature, so as to see her directly, and not through the mists of fancy, or through the distortions of prejudice, — to look at men, and into them, — to apprehend things as they were. In his conception of the universe he could not separate God from it, placing Him above it, beyond it, as the philosophers did who represented God whirling the universe round His finger, 'seeing it go.' Such a conception revolted him. He animated the universe with God ; he animated fact with divine life ; he saw in Reality the incarnation of the Ideal ; he saw in Morality the high and harmonious action of all human tendencies ; he saw in Art the highest representation of Life.

Our psychology is in so chaotic a condition, that I dare not employ its language in this attempt to characterize Goethe's tendencies, lest it mislead. In lieu thereof a few descriptive sentences must suffice : — If we look through the works with critical attention, we shall observe the concrete tendency determining — first, his choice of subjects ; secondly, his handling of characters ; and, thirdly, his style. We shall see the operation of that law of his mind, which made the creative impulses move only in alliance with emotions he himself had experienced. His Imagination was not, like that of many others, incessantly at work in the combination and recombination of images, which could be accepted for their own sake, apart from the warrant of preliminary confrontation with fact. It demanded the confrontation ; it moved with ease only on the secure ground of Reality. An illustration from science may make this distinction palpable. In science there are men whose active imaginations carry them into hypothesis and speculation, all the more easily because they do not bring hypothesis to the stern confrontation with fact. The mere delight in combining ideas suffices them : provided the deductions are logical, they seem almost indifferent to their truth. There are poets of this order ; indeed most poets are of this order. Goethe was of a quite opposite tendency. In him, as in the man of positive science, an imperious desire for reality controlled the errant facility of imagination.

Hence we see why he was led to portray Men and Women, instead of Demigods and Angels : no Posas and Theklas, but Egmonts and Clärchens. Hence also his portraitures carry this moral with them, in them, but have no 'moral' superposed — no accompanying verdict as from some outstanding judge. Further, — and this is a point to be insisted on, — his style, both in poetry and prose, is subject to the same law. It is vivid with images, but it has scarcely any 'imagery.' Most poets describe objects by metaphors or comparisons ; Goethe seldom tells you what an object is like, he tells you what it is. Shakespeare is very unlike Goethe in this respect. The prodigal luxuriance of his imagery often entangles, in its overgrowth, the movement of his verse. It is true, he also is eminently concrete : he sees the real object vividly, and he makes us see it vividly ; but he scarcely ever paints it save in the colors of metaphor and simile. Shakespeare's imagery bubbles up like a perpetual spring : to say that it repeatedly overflows, is only to say that his mind was lured by its own sirens away from the direct path. He did not master his Pegasus at all times, but let the wild careering creature take its winged way. Goethe, on the contrary, always masters his. Perhaps because his steed had less of restive life in its veins. Not only does he master it, and ride with calmer, more assured grace; he seems so bent on reaching the goal that he scarcely thinks of anything else. To quit metaphor, he may be said to use with the utmost sparingness all the aids of imagery, and to create images of the objects, rather than images of what the objects are like.

Shakespeare, like Goethe, was a decided realist. He, too, was content to let his pictures of life carry their own moral with them. He uttered no 'moral verdict;' he was no Chorus preaching on the text of what he pictured. Hence we cannot gather from his works what his opinions were. But there is this difference between him and Goethe, that his intense sympathy with the energetic passions and fierce volitions of our race made him delight in heroic characters, in men of robuster frames and more impassioned lives. Goethe, with an infusion of the best blood of Schiller, would have made a Shakespeare; but, such as Nature made him he was, — not Shakespeare.

Turning from these abstract considerations to the two earliest works which form the text, we observe how the youth is determined in the choice of his subject by the realistic tendency. Instead of ranging through the enchanted gardens of Armida — instead of throwing himself back into the distant Past, and escaping from the trammels of a modern subject which the confrontation of reality always makes more difficult, this boy fashions into verse his own experience, his own observation. He looks into his own heart, — he peers into the byways of civilization, walking with curious observation through squalid streets and dark fearful alleys. Singular, moreover, is the absence of any fierce indignation, any cry of pain at the sight of so much corruption underlying the surface of society. In youth the loss of illusions is generally followed by a cynical misanthropy, or a vehement protest. But Goethe is neither cynical nor indignant. He seems to accept the fact as a thing to be admitted, and quietly striven against, with a view to its amelioration. He seems to think with the younger Pliny, that indulgence is a part of justice, and would cite with approval the favorite maxim of the austere yet humane Thræseas, qui vitia odit homines odit, — he who hates vice hates mankind.* For in the Mitschuldigen he presents us with a set of people whose consolation is to exclaim ‘Rogues all!’ — and in after years he wrote of this piece, that it was dictated, though unconsciously, by ‘far-sighted tolerance in the appreciation of moral actions, as expressed in the eminently Christian sentence, “Let him who is without sin among you cast the first stone.” ’

How great is the anticipation of moral development implied in those words! how little Christians have in practice taken that profound saying to their hearts! and yet how deeply the universal heart affirms the truth of the saying which universal practice denies! Who does not say Amen to the words, — and who is not ready to cast the first stone upon any and every offender? Nay, so ready are we to cast stones, that Goethe will not escape for having shown so much ‘moral laxity’ (that is one of the adroit phrases with which men whisper away good names); so much ‘indifference’ under the mask of tolerance; so great a power of representing life, with so utter an absence of any moral verdict on the scenes presented.

* Pliny, lib. viii. 22. Years after the text was written, Schöll published Goethe’s note book kept at Strasburg, wherein may be read this very aphorism transcribed. It was just the sort of passage to captivate him.

CHAPTER III.

ART STUDIES.

FRAU BÖHME died. In her he lost a monitress and friend, who had kept some check on his waywardness, and drawn him into society. The Professor had long since cooled towards him, after giving up all hopes of making him another Heineccius. It was pitiful : another ornament to jurisprudence irrecoverably lost ! A youth with such remarkable dispositions, who would not be assiduous in attendance at lecture, and whose amusement during lecture was to sketch caricatures of various law dignitaries in his note book ! Indeed, the collegiate aspect of this Leipsic residence is not one promising to professors ; but we — instructed by the result — know how much better he was employed, than if he had filled a hundred volumes of note books by diligent attendance at lecture. He studied much — in his desultory manner ; he studied Molière and Corneille ; he began to translate Le menteur. The theatre was a perpetual attraction ; and even the uneasy, unsatisfied condition of his affections, was instructing him in directions whither no professor could lead him. But greater than all was the influence of Shakespeare, whom he first learned a little of through Dodd's Beauties of Shakespeare, a work not much prized in England, where the plays form part of our traditional education, but which must have been a revelation to the Germans, something analogous to what Charles Lamb's Specimens of the Old English Drama was to us. The marvellous strength and beauty of language, the bold and natural imagery of these Beauties, startled the young poets of that day, like the huge fossil remains of some antediluvian fauna ; and to gratify the curiosity thus awakened, there came Wieland's prose translation of several plays, which Goethe studied with enthusiasm.

There are no materials to fill up the lacunæ of his narrative here, so that I am forced to leave much indistinct. For instance, he has told us that Käthchen and he were no longer lovers ; but we find him writing to her in a friendly and even lover-like tone from Frankfurt, and we know that friendly intercourse still subsisted between them. Of this, however, not a word occurs in the Autobiography. Nor are we accurately informed how he made the acquaintance of the Breitkopf family. Breitkopf was a bookseller in Leipsic, in whose house Literature and Music were highly prized. Bernhard, the eldest son, was an excellent performer, and composed music to Goethe's songs, which were published in 1769, under this title : Neue Lieder in Melodien gesetzt von Bernhard Theodor Breitkopf. The poet is not named. This Liederbuch contains twenty songs, the majority of which were subsequently reprinted in the poet's works. They are love songs, and contain a love-philosophy more like what is to be found in Catullus, Horace, and Wieland, than what one would expect from a boy, did we not remember how the braggadocio of youth delights in expressing roué sentiments, as if to give itself airs of profound experience. This youth sings with gusto of inconstancy :

Da fühl ich die Freuden der Wechselden Lust.

He gaily declares that if one mistress leaves you another will love you, and the second is sweeter to kiss than the first :

Es küsst sich so süsse der Busen der Zweiten,
Als kaum sich der Busen der Ersten geküsst.

Another acquaintance, and one more directly influential, was that of Oeser, the director of the Drawing Academy. He had been the friend and teacher of Winckelmann, and his name stood high among connoisseurs. Goethe, who at home had learned a little drawing, joined Oeser's class, where, among other fellow-students, was the Hardenberg who afterwards made such a noise in the Prussian political world. He joined the class, and did his best to acquire by labor the skill which only a talent can acquire. That he made little progress in drawing, we learn from his subsequent confession, no less than from his failure, but tuition had this effect at least, — it taught him to use his eyes. In a future chapter* I shall have occasion to enter more fully on this subject. Enough if for the present a sentence or two from his letters tells us the enthusiasm Oeser inspired. 'What do I not owe to you,' he writes to him, 'for having pointed out to me the way of the True and the Beautiful!' and concludes by saying, 'the undersigned is your work!' Writing to a friend of Oeser's, he says that Oeser stands beside Shakespeare and Wieland in the influence exercised over him. 'His instruction will influence my whole life. He it was who taught me that the Ideal of Beauty is Simplicity and Repose, and thence it follows that no youth can be a master.'

Instruction in the theory of Art he gained from Oeser, from Winckelmann, and from the incomparable little book which Lessing at this period carelessly flung upon the world—the Laokoon. Its effect upon Goethe can only be appreciated by those who early in life have met with this work, and risen from it with minds widened, strengthened and inspired. It opened a pathway amid confusion, throwing light upon many of the obscurest problems which torment the artist. It awakened in Goethe an intense yearning to see the works of ancient masters; and these beckoned from Dresden. To Dresden he went. But here, in spite of Oeser, Winckelmann, and Lessing, in spite of grand phrases about Art, the invincible tendency of his nature asserted itself, and instead of falling into raptures with the great Italian pictures, he confesses that he took their merits upon trust, and was really charmed by none but the landscape and Dutch painters, whose subjects appealed directly to his experience.* He did not feel the greatness of Italian Art; and what he did not feel he would not feign.

* See Book V. ch. v.

It is worth noticing that this trip to Dresden was taken in absolute secrecy. As, many years later, he stole away to Italy without letting his friends even suspect his project, so now he left Leipsic for Dresden without a word of intimation. Probably the same motive actuated him in both instances. He went to see, to enjoy, to learn, and did not want to be disturbed by personal influence—by other people's opinions.

On his return he was active enough with drawing. He made the acquaintance of an engraver named Stock,* and with his usual propensity to try his hand at whatever his friends were doing, he forthwith began to learn engraving. In the Morgenblatt for 1828 there is a detailed account of two of his engravings, both representing landscapes with small cascades shut in by rocks and grottoes; at the foot of each are these words: peint par A. Theile, gravé par Goethe. One plate is dedicated à Monsieur Goethe, Conseillier actuel de S. M. Impériale, par son fils très obéissant. In the room which they show to strangers in his house at Frankfurt, there is also a specimen of his engraving — very amateurish; but Madame von Goethe showed me one in her possession which really has merit.

* This Stock had two amiable daughters, one of whom married (1785) Körner, the correspondent of Schiller, and father of the poet.

Melancholy, wayward, and capricious as he was at this time, he allowed Lessing to pass through Leipsic without making any attempt to see the man he so much admired: a caprice he afterwards repented, for the opportunity never recurred. Something of his hypochondria was due to mental, but more to physical causes. Dissipation, bad diet (especially the beer and coffee), and absurd endeavors to carry out Rousseau's preaching about returning to a state of nature, had seriously affected his health. The crisis came at last. One summer night (1768) he was seized with violent hæmorrhage. He had only strength enough to call to his aid the fellow-student who slept in the next room. Medical assistance promptly came. He was saved; but his convalescence was embittered by the discovery of a tumor on his neck, which lasted some time. His recovery was slow, but it seemed as if it relieved him from all the peccant humors which had made him hypochondriacal, leaving behind an inward lightness and joyousness to which he had long been a stranger. One thing greatly touched him — the sympathy expressed for him by several eminent men; a sympathy he felt to be quite undeserved, for there was not one among them whom he had not vexed or affronted by his caprices, extravagances, morbid opposition, and stubborn persistence.

One of these friends, Langer, not only made an exchange of books with him, giving a set of Classic authors for a set of German, but also, in devout yet not dogmatic conversation, led his young friend to regard the Bible in another light than that of a merely human composition. 'I loved the Bible and valued it, for it was the only book to which I owed my moral culture. Its events, dogmas and symbols were deeply impressed on my mind.' He therefore felt little sympathy with the Deists who were at this time agitating Europe; and although his tendency was strongly in favor of the Rationalists against the Mystics, he was afraid lest the poetical spirit should be swept away along with the prophetic. In one word, he was in a state of religious doubt—'destitute of faith, yet terrified at scepticism.'

This unrest and this bodily weakness he carried with him, September 1768, from Leipsic to Frankfurt, whither we will follow him.

CHAPTER IV.

RETURN HOME.

HE returned home a boy in years, in experience a man. Broken in health, unhappy in mind, with no strong impulses in any one direction, uncertain of himself and of his aims, he felt, as he approached his native city, much like a repentant prodigal, who has no vision of the fatted calf awaiting him. His father, unable to perceive the real progress he had made, was very much alive to the slender prospect of his becoming a distinguished jurist. The fathers of poets are seldom gratified with the progress visible in their sons. Only your perfectly stupid young gentlemen uniformly delight their parents: they tread the beaten path, whereon are placed milestones marking every distance; and the parents, seeing how far their sons have trudged, are freed from all misgivings. Of that silent progress which consists less in travelling on the broad highway, than in development of the limbs which will make a sturdy traveller, parents cannot judge.

Mother and sister, however, touched by the worn face, and, woman-like, more interested in the man than in what he has achieved, received him with an affection which compensated for the father's coldness. There is quite a pathetic glimpse given of this domestic interior in the Autobiography, where he alludes to his father's impatience at his illness, and anxiety for his speedy recovery.* And we gladly escape from this picture to the Letters written from Frankfurt to his old love Käthchen Schönkoptf.† It appears that he left Leipsic without saying adieu. He thus refers to it :

‘Apropos, you will forgive me that I did not take leave of you. I was in the neighborhood, I was even below at the door ; I saw the lamp burning and went to the steps, but I had not the courage to mount. For the last time — how should I have come down again ?

‘Thus I now do what I ought to have done then : I thank you for all the love and friendship which you have constantly shown me, and which I shall never forget. I need not beg you to remember me, — a thousand occasions will arise which must remind you of a man who for two years and a half was part of your family, who indeed often gave you cause for displeasure, but still was always a good lad, and whom it is to be hoped you will often miss ; at least I often miss you.’

The tumor on his neck became alarming : the more so as the surgeons, uncertain about its nature, were wavering in their treatment. Frequent cauterization, and constant confinement to his room, were the worst parts of the cure. He read, drew and etched to wile away the time ; and by the end of the year was pronounced recovered. This letter to Käthchen announces the recovery.

‘My best, anxious friend, —

‘You will doubtless have heard from Horn, on the new * Dickens has, in a masterly manner, given us the same sort of feeling in Dombey, who cannot conceal his impatience at little Paul’s illness, not because the child is ill, but because the illness interferes with his plans.

† Printed in Goethe’s Briefe an seine Leipsiger Freunde. Herausgegeben von Otto Jahn.

year, the news of my recovery ; and I hasten to confirm it. Yes, dear friend, it is over, and in future you must take it quietly, even if you hear—he is laid up again ! You know that my constitution often makes a slip, and in eight days gets on its legs again ; this time it was bad, and seemed yet worse than it was, and was attended with terrible pains. Misfortune is also a good. I have learned much in illness which I could have learned nowhere else in life. It is over, and I am quite brisk again, though for three whole weeks I have not left my room, and scarcely any one has visited me but my doctor, who, thank God ! is an amiable man ! An odd thing it is in us men : when I was in lively society I was out of spirits, now I am forsaken by all the world ; I am cheerful ; for even throughout my illness my cheerfulness has comforted my family, who were not in a condition to comfort themselves, to say nothing of me. The new year's song which you have also received, I composed during an attack of great foolery, and had it printed for the sake of amusement. Besides this I draw a great deal, write tales, and am contented with myself. God give me, this new year, what is good for me ; may He do the same for all of us, and if we pray for nothing more than this, we may certainly hope that He will give it us. If I can only get along till April, I shall easily reconcile myself to my condition. Then I hope things will be better ; in particular my health may make progress daily, because it is now known precisely what is the matter with me. My lungs are as sound as possible, but there is something wrong at the stomach. And, in confidence, I have had hopes given me of a pleasant, enjoyable mode of life, so that my mind is quite cheerful and at rest. As soon as I am better again I shall go away into foreign countries, and it must depend only on you and another person how soon I shall see Leipsic again ; in the meantime I think of going to France to see what French life is, and learn the French language. So you can imagine what a charming man I shall be when I return to you. It often occurs to me, that it would be a laughable affair, if, in spite of all my projects, I were to die before Easter. In that case I would order a grave-stone for myself in Leipsic churchyard, that at least every year on St. John's day you might visit the figure of St. John and my grave. What do you think ?'

To celebrate his recovery, Rath Moritz gave a great party, at which all the Frankfurt friends assembled. In a little while, however, another illness came to lay the poet low ; and, worse than all, there came the news from Leipsic that K  thchen was engaged to a Dr. Kanne, whom Goethe had introduced to her. This forever decided his restlessness about her. Here is a letter from him.

‘ My dear, my beloved friend, —

‘ A dream last night has reminded me that I owe you an answer. Not that I had entirely forgotten it, — not that I never think of you : no, my dear friend, every day says something of you and of my faults. But it is strange, and it is an experience which perhaps you also know, the remembrance of the absent, though not extinguished by time, is veiled. The distractions of our life, acquaintance with new objects, in short every change in our circumstances, do to our hearts what smoke and dirt do to a picture, — they make the delicate touches quite undiscernable, and in such a way that one does not know how it comes to pass. A thousand things remind me of you ; I see your image a thousand times, but as faintly, and often with as little emotion, as if I thought of some one quite strange to me ; it often recurs to me that I owe you an answer, without my feeling the slightest impulse to write to you. Now, when I read your kind letter, which is already some months old, and see your friendship and your solicitude for one so unworthy, I am shocked at myself, and for the first time feel what a change has taken place in my heart, that I can be without joy at that which formerly would have lifted me up to heaven. Forgive me this! Can one blame an unfortunate man because he is unable to rejoice? My wretchedness has made me dead to the good which still remains to me. My body is restored, but my mind is still uncured. I am in dull, inactive repose; that is not happiness. And in this quietude my imagination is so stagnant, that I can no longer picture to myself what was once dearest to me. It is only in a dream that my heart often appears to me as it is,—only a dream is capable of recalling to me the sweet images, of so recalling them, as to reanimate my feelings; I have already told you that you are indebted to a dream for this letter. I saw you, I was with you; how it was, is too strange for me to relate to you. In one word, you were married. Is that true? I took up your kind letter, and it agrees with the time; if it is true, O may that be the beginning of your happiness!

‘When I think of this disinterestedly, how does it rejoice me to know that you, my best friend, you, before every other who envied you and fancied herself better than you, are in the arms of a worthy husband; to know that you are happy, and freed from every annoyance to which a single state, and especially your single state, was exposed! I thank my dream that it has vividly depicted your happiness to me, and the happiness of your husband, and his reward for having made you happy. Obtain me his friendship in virtue of your being my friend, for you must have all things in common, even including friends. If I may believe my dream we shall see each other again, but I hope not so very quickly, and for my part I shall try to defer its fulfilment ; — if, indeed, a man can undertake anything in opposition to destiny. Formerly I wrote to you somewhat enigmatically about what was to become of me. Now I may say more plainly that I am about to change my place of residence, and move farther from you. Nothing will any more remind me of Leipsic, except, perhaps, a restless dream ; no friend who comes from thence ; no letter. And yet I perceive that this will be no help to me. Patience, time, and distance will do that which nothing else can do ; they will annihilate every unpleasant impression, and give us back our friendship, with contentment, with life, so that after a series of years we may see each other again with altogether different eyes, but with the same heart. Within a quarter of a year you shall have another letter from me, which will tell you of my destination and the time of my departure, and which can once more say to superfluity what I have already said a thousand times. I entreat you not to answer me any more ; if you have anything more to say to me, let me know it through a friend. This is a melancholy entreaty, my best ! you, the only one of all her sex, whom I cannot call friend, for that is an insignificant title compared with what I feel. I wish not to see your writing again, just as I wish not to hear your voice ; it is painful enough for me that my dreams are so busy. You shall have one more letter ; that promise I will sacredly keep, and so pay a part of my debts ; the rest you must forgive me.'

To round off this story, the following extract may be given from the last letter which has been preserved of those he wrote to her. It is dated Frankfurt, January, 1770.

' That I live peacefully is all that I can say to you of myself, and vigorously and healthily and industriously, for I have no woman in my head. Horn and I are still good friends, but, so it happens in the world, he has his thoughts and ways, and I have my thoughts and ways, and so a week passes and we scarcely see each other once. But, everything considered, I am at last tired of Frankfurt, and at the end of March I shall leave it. I must not yet go to you, I perceive ; for if I came at Easter you could not be married. And Käthchen Schönpkopf I will not see again, if I am not to see her otherwise than so. At the end of March, therefore, I go to Strasburg ; if you care to know that, as I believe you do. Will you write to me to Strasburg also ? You will play me no trick. For, Käthchen Schönpkopf, now I know perfectly that a letter from you is as dear to me as from any hand in the world. You were always a sweet girl, and will be a sweet woman. And I, I shall remain Goethe. You know what that means. If I name my name, I name my whole self, and you know that so long as I have known you I have lived only as part of you.'

Sic transit ! So fall away the young blossoms of love which have not the force to ripen into fruit. 'The most loveable heart,' he writes to Käthchen, with a certain bitter humor, 'is that which loves the most readily ; but that which easily loves also easily forgets.' It was his case ; he could not live without some one to love, but his mobile nature soon dried the tears wrung from him by her loss.

Turning once more to his domestic condition, we find him in cold, unpleasant relations with his father, who had almost excited the hatred of his other child, Cornelia, by the stern, pedantic, pedagogic way in which he treated her. The old man continued to busy himself with the writing of his travels in Italy, and with instructing his daughter. She, who was of a restless, excitable, almost morbid disposition, secretly rebelled against his tyranny, and made her brother the confidant of all her griefs. The poor mother had a terrible time of it, trying to pacify the children, and to stand between them and their father.

Very noticeable is one detail recorded by him. He had fallen ill again : this time with a stomach disorder, which no therapeutic treatment in the power of Frankfurt medicine seemed to mitigate. The family physician was one of those duped dupers who still stood to the great promises of Alchemy. It was whispered that he had in his possession a marvellous panacea, which was only to be employed in times of greatest need, and of which, indeed, no one dared openly speak. Frau Aja, trembling for her son, besought him to employ this mysterious salt. He consented. The patient recovered, and belief in the physician's skill became more complete. Not only was the poet thus restored once more to health, he was also thereby led to the study of Alchemy, and, as he narrates, employed himself in researches after the ' virgin earth.' In the little study of that house in the Hirsch-graben, he collected his glasses and retorts, and following the directions of authorities, sought for a time to penetrate the mystery which then seemed penetrable. Through these pursuits he was induced to read not only Theophrastus, Paracelsus, Van Helmont, and other alchemists, but also the more serviceable Chemical Compendium of Boerhaave, whose 'Aphorisms' greatly delighted him. These studies were preparations for Faust.

Renewed intercourse with Fräulein von Klettenberg, together with much theological and philosophical reading, brought Religion into prominence in his thoughts. He has given a sketch of the sort of Neoplatonic Christianity into which his thoughts moulded themselves ; but as this sketch was written so very many years after the period to which it relates, one cannot well accept its authenticity. For biographic purposes it is enough to indicate that beside these Alchemic studies, Religion rose also into serious importance. Poetry seemed quite to have deserted him, although he still occasionally touched up his two plays. In a letter he humorously exposes the worthlessness of the Bardenpoesie then in fashion among versifiers, who tried to be patriotic and Tyrtæan by huddling together golden helmets, flashing swords, the tramp of horses, and, when the verse went lame for want of a syllable, supplying an Oh! or Ha! ‘Make me feel,’ he says, ‘what I have not yet felt,—make me think what I have not yet thought, then I will praise you. But shrieks and noise will never supply the place of pathos.’

The trace of a slight love affair, during this summer of 1769, has been discovered by Viehoff. Charity Meixner, of Worms, is not mentioned in the Autobiography, it is true; but neither is Oeser’s daughter Frederika, for whom he had a very lively friendship, which probably her satirical tendency kept from warming into love. Charity was the daughter of a merchant, and Viehoff has seen two letters to her which leave no doubt of the warmth of Goethe’s feelings for the young poetess. But that heart, which ‘so readily loves and so easily forgets,’ wandered from Charity, as it wandered from others; and she buried his inconstancy in a ‘copy of verses’ and a rich husband.

Paoli, the Corsican Patriot, passed through Frankfurt at this time, and Goethe saw him in the house of Bethmann, the rich merchant; but, with this exception, Frankfurt presented nothing beyond deadly prose to him, and he was impatient to escape from it. His health was sufficiently restored for his father to hope that now Jurisprudence could be studied with some success; and Strasburg was the university selected for that purpose.

CHAPTER V.

STRASBURG.

HE reached Strasburg on the 2d April, 1770. He was now turned twenty, and a more magnificent youth never perhaps entered the Strasburg gates. Long before he was celebrated, he was likened to an Apollo : when he entered a restaurant the people laid down their knives and forks to stare at him. Pictures and busts give a very feeble indication of that which was most striking in his appearance ; they only give the cut of feature, not the play of feature ; nor are they very accurate even in mere form. The features were large and liberally cut, as in the fine sweeping lines of Greek Art. The brow lofty and massive, from beneath which shone large lustrous brown eyes of marvellous beauty, their pupils being of almost unexampled size ; the slightly aquiline nose was large and finely cut ; the mouth full, with a short arched lip, very expressive ; the chin and jaw boldly proportioned, and the head resting on a fine muscular neck : — details which are, after all, but the inventory of his appearance, and give no clear image of it.

In stature he was rather above the middle size ; but although not really tall, he had the aspect of a tall man, and is usually so described, because his presence was very imposing.* His frame was strong, muscular, yet sensitive. Dante says this contrast is in the nature of things, for — ‘ Quanta la cosa è più perfetta,

Più senta ’l bene, e così la doglienza.’

Excelling in all active sports, he was almost a barometer in sensitiveness to atmospheric influences.

Such, externally, was the youth who descended at the hotel zum Geist, in Strasburg, this 2d April, and who, ridding himself of the dust and ennui of a long imprisonment in the Diligence, sallied forth to gaze at the famous Cathedral, which made a wonderful impression on him as he came up to it through the narrow streets. The Strasburg Cathedral not inaptly serves as the symbol of his early German tendencies; and its glorious tower is always connected, in my mind, with the brief but ardent endeavors of his Hellenic nature to throw itself into the old German world. German his spirit was not, but we shall see him, under the shadow of this tower, for a moment inspired with true German enthusiasm.

His lodgings secured — No. 80, on the south side of the Fish-market — he delivered his letters of introduction, and arranged to dine at a table d’hôte kept by two maiden ladies, named Lauth, in the Krämergasse, No. 13. The guests here were about ten in number, mostly medical. Their president was Dr. Saltzmann, a clean old bachelor of fifty, scrupulous in his stockings, immaculate as to his shoes and buckles, with hat under his arm and scarcely ever on his head — a neat, dapper, old gentleman, well instructed, and greatly liked by the poet, to whom he gave excellent advice, and for whom he found a valuable repe- tent.*† In spite of the services of this excellent repetent, jurisprudence wearied him considerably, according to his account; at first, however, he seems to have taken to it with some pleasure, as we learn by a letter, in which he tells Fräulein von Klettenberg a different story: — ‘Jurisprudence begins to please me very much. Thus it is with all things as with Merseburg beer; the first time we shudder at it, and having drunk it for a week, we cannot do without it.’ The study of jurisprudence at any rate did not absorb him. Schöll has published a notebook kept during this period, which reveals an astonishing activity in desultory research.†* When we remember that the society at his table d’hôte was principally of medical students, we are prepared to find him eagerly throwing himself into the study of anatomy and chemistry. He attended Lobstein’s lectures on Anatomy, Ehrmann’s clinical lectures, with those of his son on midwifery, and Spielman’s on chemistry. Electricity occupied him, Franklin’s great discovery having brought that subject into prominence. No less than nine works on electricity are set down in the notebook to be studied. We also see from this notebook that chromatic subjects began to attract him — the future antagonist of Newton was preluding in the science. Alchemy still fascinated him; and he wrote to Fräulein von Klettenberg, assuring her that these mystical studies were

* Rauch, the sculptor, who made the well-known statuette of Goethe, explained this to me as owing to his large bust and erect carriage.

† The medical student will best understand what a repetent is, if I translate it a grinder; the university student, if I translate it a coach. The repetent prepares students by an examination, and also by repeating and explaining in private what the professor has taught in the lecture hall.

* Briefe und Aufsätze von Goethe. Herausgegeben von Adolf Schöll. In this, as in his other valuable work, Schöll is not content simply to reprint papers entrusted to him, but enriches them by his own careful, accurate editing.

his secret mistresses. With such a direction of his thoughts, and the influence of this pure, pious woman still operating upon him, we can imagine the disgust which followed his study of the Système de la Nature, then making so great a noise in the world. This dead and dull exposition of an atheism as superficial as it was dull, must have been everyway revolting to him : irritating to his piety, and unsatisfying to his reason. Voltaire's wit and Rousseau's sarcasms he could copy into his notebook, especially when they pointed in the direction of tolerance, as in the extract from Voltaire ending thus :

‘Très sots enfans de Dieu, chérissez vous en frères, Et ne vous mordez plus pour d'absurdes chimères ;’

or this sentence from Rousseau : ‘Le péché original explique tout, excepté son principe, et c'est ce principe qu'il s'agit d'expliquer.’ But he who could read Bayle, Voltaire, and Rousseau with delight, turned from the Système de la Nature with disgust ; especially at a time when we find him taking the sacrament, and trying to keep up an acquaintance with the pious families to which Fräulein von Klettenberg had introduced him. I say trying, because even his goodwill could not long withstand their dulness and narrowness ; he was forced to give them up, and confessed so much to his friend.

Shortly after his arrival in Strasburg, namely in May 1770, an event occurred which agitated the town, and gave him an opportunity of seeing, for the first time, Raphael's cartoons. Marie Antoinette, the dauphiness of France elect, was to pass through on her way to Paris. On a small island on the Rhine a building was erected for her reception ; and this was adorned with tapestries worked after the cartoons. These tapestries roused his enthusiasm ; but he was shocked to find that they were placed in the side chambers, while the chief salon was hung with tapestries worked after pictures by modern French artists. That Raphael should thus be thrown into a subordinate position was less exasperating to him than the subjects chosen from the modern artists. ‘These pictures were the history of Jason, Medea, and Creusa — consequently, a story of a most wretched marriage. To the left of the throne was seen the bride struggling against a horrible death, surrounded by persons full of sympathetic grief; to the right stood the father, horror-struck at the murdered babes at his feet; whilst the fury, in her dragon car, drove through the air.’

All the ideas which he had learned from Oeser were outraged by this selection. He did not quarrel so much with the arrangement which placed Christ and the Apostles in side chambers, since he had thereby been enabled to enjoy the sight of them. ‘But a blunder like that of the grand saloon put me altogether out of my self-possession, and with loud and vehement cries I called to my comrades to witness the insult against feeling and taste. “What!” I exclaimed, regardless of bystanders, “can they so thoughtlessly place before the eyes of a young queen, on her first setting foot in her dominions, the representation of the most horrible marriage perhaps that ever was consummated! Is there among the architects and decorators no one man who understands that pictures represent something — that they work upon the mind and feelings — that they produce impressions and excite forebodings? It is as if they had sent a ghastly spectre to meet this lovely, and as we hear most joyous, lady at the very frontiers!”’ To him, indeed, pictures meant something; they were realities to him, because he had the true artistic nature. But to the French architects, as to the Strasburg officials, pictures were pictures, — ornaments betokening more or less luxury and taste, flattering the eye, but never touching the soul.

Goethe was right; and omen-lovers may now see in that picture the dark foreshadowing of her destiny. But no one then could have foreseen that her future career would be less triumphant than her journey from Vienna to Paris. That smiling, happy, lovely princess of fifteen, whose grace and beauty extort expressions of admiration from every beholder, as she wends her way along roads lined with the jubilant peasantry leaving their fields to gaze upon her, through streets strewn with nosegays, through triumphal arches, and rows of maidens garlanded, awaiting her arrival to offer her spring-flowers as symbols — can her joy be for a moment dashed by a pictured sorrow? Can omens have a dark significance to her?

‘I still vividly remember,’ says Goethe, ‘the beauteous and lofty mien, as charming as it was dignified, of the young princess. Plainly visible in her carriage, she seemed to be jesting with her female attendants respecting the throng which poured forth to meet her train.’ Scarcely had the news of her happy arrival in the capital reached them, than it was followed by the dreadful intelligence of the accident which had disturbed the festivities of her marriage. Goethe’s thoughts naturally recurred to the ominous pictures: a nature less superstitious would not have been entirely unmoved by such a coincidence.

‘The excitement over, the Strasburgers fell into their accustomed tranquillity. The mighty stream of courtly magnificence had now flowed by, and left me no other longing than that for the tapestries of Raphael, which I could have contemplated and worshipped every hour. Luckily my earnest desires succeeded in interesting several persons of consequence, so that the tapestries were not taken down till the very last moment.’

The halt, the lame, and the blind had been sedulously kept out of the dauphiness's way, lest their appearance should mar the joyousness of her reception. Many were the witticisms hazarded on this subject ; and Goethe composed a little poem in French, contrasting the advent of our Saviour, who came into this world almost especially on account of the sick and deformed, with the advent of the young princess, which made the unfortunate wretches disappear. His friends were delighted with this poem ; but a Frenchman having pitilessly criticized some of the expressions and the versification, it was destroyed. ' I never remember to have again written French verses.'

An alleged copy of these verses, supposed to be destroyed, has been published by Pfeiffer,* and may be inserted here :

Lorsque le fils de Dieu descendit sur la terre,
Pour bénir les mortels comblés de misère,
On vit de tous côtés se presser sur ses pas
Des boiteux, des perclus gisants sur leurs grabats.
Mais lorsque des Français l'auguste reine avance, Qu'elle pose le pied sur la terre de la France,
La police attentive a soin de décréter,
Qu'à son royal regard ne doit se présenter
Ni bossu, ni goutteux, ni pauvre apoplectique,
Ni perclus, ni bancal, ni même rachitique.
Comme ça de chez soi Strasbourg fait les honneurs !
O siècle ! O temps ! O mœurs !

The want of authenticity which discredits Pfeiffer's book, of course discredits these verses. Internal evidence is fallacious ; for although the faults of language noticeable in them are of the kind alluded to by Goethe, yet they may have been made expressly to suit his description. Pfeiffer, and after him Viehoff, notice comblés de misère as false in idiom and false in rhythm, wondering how the proper phrase accablés de misère could have been overlooked. But it seems one of those errors which would be made expressly; and still more suspicious is the ‘des perclus gisants sur leur grabats qui se pressent sur ses pas’ — which is not the style Goethe would fall into in any language. On the other hand the shocking vulgarity of has a certain stamp of authenticity on it. It is the French he might have picked up from the soldiers with whom he conversed so freely in Frankfurt.

* Goethe's Frederika, von Freimund Pfeiffer. The book is a clever mystification, which has taken in even sharp sighted and well-instructed writers ; but it is now acknowledged not to be genuine.

Comme ça de chez soi Strasbourg fait les honneurs !

The re-established quiet left him time for studies again. In a letter of this date, he intimates that he is ‘so improved in knowledge of Greek as almost to read Homer without a translation. I am a week older; that you know says a great deal with me, not because I do much, but many things.’ Among these many things, we must note his ardent search through mystical metaphysical writings for the pabulum on which his insatiable appetite could feed. Strange revelations in this direction are afforded by his Note-book. On one page there is a passage from Thomas à Kempis, followed by a list of mystical works to be read; on another page, sarcastic sentences from Rousseau and Voltaire; on a third, a reference to Tauler. The book contains an analysis of the Phædon of Moses Mendelssohn contrasted with that of Plato; and a defence of Giordano Bruno against the criticism of Bayle.

Apropos of Bruno, one may remark the early tendency of Goethe’s mind towards Nature-worship. Tacitus, indeed, noticed this tendency as national.* The scene in Frankfurt, where the boy-priest erected his Pantheistic altar, will help to explain the interest he must have felt in the glimpse Bayle gave him of the great Pantheist of the sixteenth century — the brilliant and luckless Bruno, who after teaching the heresy of Copernicus at Rome and Oxford, after combating Aristotle and gaining the friendship of Sir Philip Sidney, was publicly burnt on the 17th February, 1600, in the presence of the Roman crowd, expiating thus the crime of teaching that the earth moved, — the Church declaring it to be stable. A twofold interest attached itself to the name of Bruno. He was a martyr of Philosophy, and his works were rare; every one abused him, few had read him. He was hated almost as much as Spinoza, and scarcely any one knew the writings thus reviled. The rarity of Bruno's works made them objects of bibliopolic luxury; some were among the black swans of literature. The Spaccio had been sold for thirty pounds in England, and three hundred florins in Holland. Hamann, whom Herder and Goethe ardently admired, searched Italy and Germany for the De la Causa and Del Infinito in vain. Forbidden fruit is tempting; but when the fruit is rare, as well as forbidden, the attraction is irresistible.† Pantheism, which captivates poetical minds, * De Moribus, ix. sub fine. What Tacitus there represents as a more exalted creed than anthropomorphism, was really a lower form of religious conception — the Fetichism, which in primitive races precedes Polytheism.

† Since then the works have been made accessible through the cheap and excellent edition collected by A. Wagner: Opere di Giordano Bruno Nolano. 2 vols. Leipsic: 1830. But I do not observe that, now they are accessible, many persons interest themselves enough in Bruno to read them; yet they are better worth study than hundreds of metaphysical works eagerly read.

has a poetical grandeur in the form given to it by Bruno which would have allured Goethe had his tendencies not already lain in that direction. To preach that doctrine Bruno became a homeless wanderer, and his wanderings ended in martyrdom. Nothing could shake his faith; as he loftily says, ‘con questa filosofia l’anima mi s’aggrandisce e mi si magnifica l’intelletto.’

Goethe’s notes on Bayle’s criticism may be given here, as illustrating his metaphysical opinions and his mastery of French composition. We can be certain of the authenticity of the French: with inaccuracies and inelegancies, it is fluent and expressive, and gives one the idea of greater conversational command of the language than he reports of himself.

‘Je ne suis pas du sentiment de M. Bayle à l’égard de Jor. Brunus, et je ne trouve ni d’impiété ni d’absurdité dans les passages qu’il cite, quoique d’ailleurs je ne prétende pas d’excuser cet homme paradoxe. “L’uno, l’infinito, lo ente e quello ch’è in tutto, e per tutto anzi è l’istezzo ubiquo. E che cosse la infinita dimensione per non essere magnitudine coincide coll’individuo, come la infinita moltitudine, per non esser numero coincide coll’unita.”’ Giord. Brun. Epist. Ded. del Tratt. de la Causa Principio et Uno.*

‘Ce passage mériterait une explication et une recherche plus philosophiques que le disc. de M. Bayle. Il est plus facile de prononcer un passage obscur et contraire à nos notions que de le déchiffrer, et que de suivre les idées d'un grand homme. Il est de même du passage où il plaisante sur une idée de Brunus, que je n'applaudis pas entièrement, si peu que les précédentes, mais que je crois du moins profondes et peut-être fécondes pour un observateur judicieux. Notez, je vous prie, de B. une absurdité : il dit que ce n'est point l'être qui fait qu'il y a beaucoup de choses, mais que cette multitude consiste dans ce qui paroît sur la superficie de la substance.'

* ‘The One, the Infinite, the Being, and that which is in all things is everywhere the same. Thus infinite extension not being magnitude coincides with the individual, as infinite multitude because it is not number coincides with unity.’ The words in italics are given as in Goethe—carelessly copied for l’istesso and così. Opere i. p. 211, ed. Wagner.

In the same Note-book there is a remarkable comment on a chapter in Fabricius (Bibliog. Antiq.), which Goethe has written in Latin, and which may be thus rendered : 'To discuss God apart from Nature is both difficult and perilous ; it is as if we separated the soul from the body. We know the soul only through the medium of the body, and God only through Nature. Hence the absurdity, as it appears to me, of accusing those of absurdity who philosophically have united God with the world. For everything which exists, necessarily pertains to the essence of God, because God is the one Being whose existence includes all things. Nor does the Holy Scripture contradict this, although we differently interpret its dogmas each according to his views. All antiquity thought in the same way ; an unanimity which to me has great significance. To me the judgment of so many men speaks highly for the rationality of the doctrine of emanation ; though I am of no sect, and grieve much that Spinoza should have coupled this pure doctrine with his detestable errors.' *

* I subjoin the original, as the reader may not be displeased to see a specimen of Goethe's Latin composition : Separatim de Deo, et natura rerum disserere difficile et periculosum est, eodem modo quam si de corpore et anima sejunctim cogitamus. Animam nonnisi mediante corpore, Deum nonnisi perspecta natura cognoscimus ; hinc absurdum mihi videtur, eos absurditatis accusare, qui ratio-

This reference to Spinoza, whom he subsequently revered as one of his best teachers, is easily explicable when we reflect that he then knew no more of Spinoza than could be gathered from Bayle.

Time was not all consumed by these studies, multifarious as they were. Lively Strasburg had its amusements, and Goethe joined his friend Salzmann in many a pleasant party. The various pleasure grounds and public gardens were always crowded with promenaders, and there the mixture of the old national costume with modern fashions gave charming variety to the scene, and made the pretty women still more piquante.

Salzmann introduced him to several families, and thus more than by all his advice helped to soften down the exuberant expression of animal spirits which made the young poet a terror to 'proprieties;' for by inducing him to frequent society, it forced him to learn that demeanor which society imperatively demands. In Wilhelm Meister great stress is laid upon the culture necessary to fit a man of genius for society; and one of the great motives advanced for the pursuance of a theatrical career is the facility it affords a man of gaining address.

An excitable, impetuous youth, ambitious of shining in society, yet painfully conscious of the unsuitableness of einatone maxime philosophica Deum cum mundo conjungere. Quæ enim sunt omnia ad essentiam Dei pertinere necesse est, cum Deus sit unicum existens et omnia comprehendat. Nec Sacer Codex nostræ sententiæ refragatur, cujus tamen dicta ab unoquoque in sententiam suam torqueri patientur ferimus. Omnis antiquitatis ejusdem fuit sententiæ, cui consensui quam multum tribuo. Testimonio enim mihi est virorum tantorum sententia rectæ rationi quam convenientissimum fuisse systema emanativum, licet nulli subscribere velim sectæ, valdeque doleam Spinozismum, teterrimis erroribus ex eodem fonte manantibus, doctrinæ huic purissimæ iniquissimum fratrem natum esse.

his previous training for the attainment of that quietness deemed so necessary, would require to attend to every trifle which might affect his deportment. Thus, although he had magnificent hair, he allowed the hairdresser to tie it up in a bag and affix a false queue. This obliged him to remain propped up powdered, from an early hour of the morning, and also to keep from overheating himself and from violent gestures, lest he should betray the false ornament. 'This restraint contributed much towards making me for a time more gentle and polite in my bearing; and I got accustomed to shoes and stockings, and to carrying my hat under my arm; I did not, however, neglect wearing fine under-stockings as a protection against the Rhine gnats.' To these qualifications as a cavalier, he added those of an excellent swordsman and rider. With his fellow-students he had abundant exercise in the use of the rapier; and prompted, I presume, by his restless desire to do all that his friends did, he began to learn the violoncello!

His circle of friends widened; and even that of his fellow-boarders in the Krämergasse increased. Among the latter, two deserved special mention — Jung Stilling and Franz Lerse. Stilling has preserved an account of their first meeting.* About twenty were assembled at dinner, when a young man entered the room in high spirits, whose large clear eyes, splendid brow, and beautifully proportioned figure, irresistibly drew the attention of Herrn Troost and Stilling. The former remarked, 'That must be an extraordinary man!' Stilling assented; but feared lest they might be somewhat annoyed by him, he looked such a wild rollicking fellow. Meanwhile they learned that this student, whose unconstrained freedom and à plomb made them draw under their shells, was named Herr Goethe. Dinner proceeded. Goethe, who sat opposite Stilling, had completely the lead in conversation, without once seeking it. At length one of the company began quizzing the wig of poor Stilling; and the fun was relished by all except Troost, Salzmann, and one who, indignantly reproving them for making game of so inoffensive a person, silenced the ridicule immediately; this was none other than the large-eyed student whose appearance had excited Stilling's uneasiness. The friendship thus begun, was continued by the sympathy and tender affectionateness Goethe always displayed towards the simple, earnest, and unfriended thinker, whose deep religious convictions, and trusting child-like nature, singularly interested him. Goethe was never tired of listening to the story of his life. Instinctively he sought on all sides to penetrate the mysteries of humanity, and, by probing every man's experience to make it his own. Here was a poor charcoal-burner, who from tailoring had passed to keeping a school; that failing, he had resumed his needle; and having joined a religious sect, had, in silent communion with his own soul, gained for himself a sort of culture which raised him above the ordinary height of men:—what was there in his life or opinions to captivate the riotous, sceptical, prosperous student? There was earnestness—there was genuineness. Goethe was eminently qualified to become the friend of one who held opposite convictions to his own, for his tolerance was large and genuine, and he respected every real conviction. Sympathizing with Stilling, listening to him, and dexterously avoiding any interference with his religious faith, he was not only enabled to be his friend, but also to learn quietly and surely the inner nature of such men.

* H. Stilling's Wanderschaft, p. 158.

Franz Lersé attracted him by different qualities: upright manliness, scrupulous orderliness, dry humor, and a talent for reconciling antagonists. As a memorial of their friendship, his name is given to the gallant fellow who knows how to subordinate himself with dignity in Götz von Berlichingen.

Generally speaking Goethe is so liberal in information about his friends and contemporaries, and so sparing of precise indications of his own condition, that we are left in the dark respecting much that would be welcome. There is one thing mentioned by him which is very significant: although his health was sufficiently established for ordinary purposes, he still suffered from great irritability. Loud sounds were disagreeable to him; diseased objects aroused loathing and horror. And he was especially troubled with giddiness, which came over him whenever he looked down from a height. All these infirmities he resolved to conquer, and that somewhat violently. In the evening when they beat the tattoo, he went close to the drums, though the powerful rolling and beating of so many seemed enough to make his heart burst in his bosom. Alone he ascended the highest pinnacle of the cathedral, and sat in what is called the neck, under the crown, for a quarter of an hour before venturing to step out again into the open air. Standing on a platform, scarcely an ell square, he saw before him a boundless prospect, the church and everything upon which he stood being concealed by the ornaments. He felt exactly as if carried up in a balloon. These painful sensations he repeated until they became quite indifferent; he subsequently derived great advantage from this conquest, in mountainous excursions and geological studies. Anatomy was also of double value, as it taught him to tolerate the most repulsive sights while satisfying his thirst for knowledge. He succeeded so well that no hideous sight could disturb his self-possession.

He also sought to steel himself against the terrors of imagination. The awful and shuddering impressions of darkness in churchyards, solitary places, churches and chapels by night, he contrived to render indifferent — so much so, that when a desire came over him to recall in such scenes the pleasing shudder of youth, he could scarcely succeed even by the strangest and most terrific images.

Two love poems, written during this year — Stirbt der Fuchs so gilt der Balg, and Blinde Kuh — put us on the scent of flirtations. He is silent respecting Dorilis and Theresa in his autobiography; and in ordinary cases a biographer would accept that silence, without drawing any conclusion from the poems. No one hereafter will think of identifying the Claribels, Isabels, and Madelines, with young ladies whom our poets met in society, and who led captive their inconstant hearts. With Goethe it is otherwise. All his poems grow out of occasions: they are flowers of which circumstance is the earth. Utterances of real feelings to real beings, they are unlike all coquettings with imaginary beauties. His poems are evidences.* Unhappily, the bare fact is all we can discover.

One love affair, however, was not so easily effaced. From childhood his strange didactic father had instructed him and his sister in dancing, a task which, as we picture to ourselves the cold, formal, rigorous old Frankfurter, seems rather ludicrous. He was perfectly unconscious of any incongruity. With the utmost gravity he drilled them into a minuet, playing to them on the flageolet. Since then Goethe's dancing had been neglected, and when he stood up to a minuet once at Leipsic, he got through it so awkwardly as to draw upon himself the suspicion of having done so to prevent being invited again.

* I find Viehoff insisting on a similar clue: he supposes Dorilis and Theresa (probably one and the same person) to be real persons, and that Goethe knew them through Salzmann.

A handsome youth unable to dance was an anomaly in Strasburg. Not a Sunday evening passed without the pleasure gardens being crowded with gay dancers ; galas frequently enlivened the week ; and the merry Alsatians, then as now, never meet but they must commence spinning round in the waltz. It is a pleasant sight. The girls are whirling round and round in the arms of their lovers ; the old people are seated at small tables under the branching shade of fragrant boughs, pipes hanging luxuriously from the placid mouths of the men, while before them stand chopins of Strasburg beer — detestable to all but Alsatian palates ; and children are playing about the benches. Into these gardens, amidst these waltzers, Goethe constantly went — yet could not waltz ! In private society the case was still worse. He resolved at length to learn. A friend recommended him to a dancing-master of repute, who soon pronounced himself gratified with his progress.

This master, a dry, precise, but amiable Frenchman, had two daughters, who assisted him at his lessons, acting both as partners and correctors. Two pretty girls, both under twenty, charming with French vivacity and coquetry, could not fail to interest the young poet ; nor could the graceful, handsome youth fail to create an impression on two girls whose lives were somewhat lonesome. Symptoms of this interest very soon showed themselves. The misfortune was that the state of their feelings made what dramatists call ‘a situation.’ Goethe’s heart inclined towards Emilia, who loved another ; while that of Lucinda, the elder sister, was bestowed upon him. Emilia was afraid to trust herself too much with him, but Lucinda was always at hand, ready to waltz with him, to protract his lesson, or to show him little attentions. There were not many pupils, so that he often remained after his lesson to chat away the time, or to read aloud to them a romance : dangerous moments !

He saw how things stood, yet puzzled himself about the reserve of the younger sister. The cause of it came out at last. One evening, after the dance was over, Lucinda detained him in the dancing-room, telling him that her sister was in the sitting-room with a fortune-teller, who was disclosing the condition of a lover to whom the girl's heart was given. 'Mine,' said Lucinda, 'is free, and I must get used to its being slighted.'

He tried to parry this thrust by divers little compliments ; and, indiscreetly enough, advised her to try her own fate with the fortune-teller, offering to do the same himself. Lucinda did not like that tampering with fate, declaring that the disclosures of the oracle were too true to be made a matter of sport. Probably this piqued him into a little more earnestness than he had shown, for ultimately he persuaded her to go into the sitting-room with him. They found Emilia much pleased with the information that she had received from the pythoness, who was highly flattered at the new resort to her shrine. A handsome reward was promised her if she should disclose the truth. With the customary ceremonial she began to tell the fortune of the elder sister. She hesitated. 'Oh, I see,' said Emilia, 'that you have something unpleasant to tell.' Lucinda turned pale, but said, 'Speak out ; it will not cost me my life.' The fortune-teller heaved a deep sigh, and proceeded with her disclosures. Lucinda, she said, was in love ; but her love was not returned ; another person standing in the way. And she went on with more in the same style. It is not difficult to imagine that the sybil should readily enough interpret the little drama which was then acting by the youth and two girls before her eyes. Lucinda showed evidence of distress ; and the old woman endeavored to give a better turn to the affair by throwing out hopes of letters and money. ‘Letters,’ said Lucinda, ‘I do not expect ; and money I do not want. If I love as you say, I have a right to be loved in return.’ The fortune-teller shuffled the cards again ; but that only made matters worse ; the girl now appeared in the oracular vision in greater trouble, her lover at a greater distance. A third shuffle of the cards was still worse ; Lucinda burst into a passionate flood of tears, and rushed from the room. ‘Follow her,’ said Emilia, ‘and comfort her.’ But he hesitated, not seeing what comfort he could well give, as he could not assure her of some return for her affection. ‘Let us go together,’ he replied. Emilia doubted whether her presence would do good ; but she consented. Lucinda had locked herself in ; and paying the old woman for the work, Goethe left the house.

He had scarcely courage to revisit the sisters ; but on the third day Emilia sent for him, and he received his lesson as usual. Lucinda, however, was absent ; and when he asked for her, Emilia told him that she was in bed, declaring that she should die. She had thrown out great reproaches against him for his ungrateful behavior. ‘And yet I do not know,’ said he, ‘that I am guilty of having expressed any sort of affection for her. I know somebody who can bear me witness of that.’ Emilia smiled. ‘I comprehend,’ she said ; ‘but if we are not careful we shall all find ourselves in a disastrous position. Forgive me if I say that you must not go on with your lessons. My father says that he is ashamed to take your money any longer, unless you mean to pursue the art of dancing ; since you know already what is needed by a young man in the world.' 'Do you tell me to avoid the house, Emilia?' he asked. 'Yes,' she said; 'but not on my own account. When you had gone the other day, I had the cards cut for you; and the same answer was given thrice. You were surrounded by friends, and all sorts of good fortune; but the ladies kept aloof from you: my poor sister stood furthest of all. One other constantly came near to you; but never close; for a third person, a man, always came between. I will confess that I thought I was myself this second lady; and now you will understand my advice. I have promised myself to another, and until now I loved him more than any one. Yet your presence might become more dangerous to me than it has been; and then what a position would be yours between two sisters, one of whom you would have made miserable by your affection, and the other by your coldness.' She held out her hand and bade him farewell; she then led him to the door; and in token that it was to be their last meeting she threw herself upon his bosom and kissed him tenderly. Just as he had put his arms round her, a side door flew open, and her sister rushed in 'in a night dress,' crying, 'You shall not be the only one to take leave of him!' Emilia released him. Lucinda took him in her arms, pressed her black locks against his cheeks; remained thus for some time, and then drawing back looked him earnestly in the face. He took her hand, and tried to muster some kind expressions to soothe her; but she turned away, walked passionately up and down the room, and then threw herself in great agitation into a corner of the sofa. Emilia went up to her, but was violently repulsed and a scene ensued, which had in it, says the principal performer, nothing really theatrical, although it could only be represented on the stage by an actor of sensibility. Lucinda poured forth reproaches against her sister. ‘This,’ said she, ‘is not the first heart beating for me that you have wheedled away. Was it not so with the one now betrothed to you, while I looked on and bore it? I, only, know the tears it cost me; and now you would rob me of this one. How many would you manage to keep at once? I am frank and easy-tempered, and all think they understand me at once, and may slight me. You are secret and quiet, and make people wonder at what may be concealed behind: there is nothing there but a cold, selfish heart, sacrificing everything to itself.’ Emilia seated herself by her sister, and remained silent while Lucinda, growing more excited, began to betray matters not quite proper for him to hear. Emilia made a sign to him to withdraw. But Lucinda caught the sound, sprang towards him, and then remained lost in thought. ‘I know that I have lost you,’ she said: ‘I claim you no more; — but neither shall you have him.’ So saying, she grasped him wildly by the head with her hands thrust among his hair, pressed her face to his and kissed him repeatedly on the mouth. ‘Now fear my curse! Woe upon woe, for ever and ever, to her who for the first time after me kisses these lips! Dare to sport with him now! Heaven hears my curse! And you, begone, begone while you may!’

He hurried from the house never to return. Is not this narrative like a scene in a novel? The excited little French woman — the bewildered poet — the old fortune-teller, and the dry old dancing master, faintly sketched, in the background, are the sort of figures a novelist would delight in.

CHAPTER VI.

HERDER AND FREDERIKA.

ONE thing very noticeable in this Strasburg period is the thoroughly German culture it gave him. In those days culture was mostly classical and French. Classical studies had never exercised much influence over him, and indeed throughout his career he approached antiquity more through Art than through the Greek and Roman writers. To the French, on the other hand, he owed a great deal, both of direction and material. A revival of the old German nationality was, however, actively agitated at this epoch. Klopstock, Lessing, Herder, Shakespeare and Ossian were the rivals opposed to France. A feeling of national pride gave its momentum to this change in taste. Gothic art began to be considered the true art of modern times.

At the table d'hôte our friends, all German, not only banished the French language, but made a point of being in every way unlike the French. French literature was ridiculed, as affected, insincere, unnatural. The truth, homely strength, and simplicity of the German character were set against this literature of courtiers. Goethe had been dabbling in mediæval studies, had been awe-struck by the cathedral, had been inspired by Shakespeare, and had seen Lessing's iconoclastic wit scattering the pretensions of French poetry. Moreover he had read the biography of Götz von Berlichingen, and the picture of that Titan in an age of anarchy had so impressed itself upon him, that the conception of a dramatic reproduction of it had grown up in his mind. Faust also lay there as a germ. The legend of that wonder-worker especially attracted him. 'Like him, too, I had swept the circle of science, and had early learned its vanity; like him I had trodden various paths, always returning unsatisfied.' The studies of alchemy, medicine, jurisprudence, philosophy and theology, which had so long engaged him, must have made him feel quite a personal interest in the old Faust legend; but to have carried this legend about with him implies also a strong mediæval tendency.

In such a mood the acquaintance with Herder was of great importance. Herder was five years his senior, and had already created a name for himself. He came to Strasburg with an eye-disease, which obliged him to remain there the whole winter, during the cure. Goethe, charmed with this new vigorous intellect, attended on him during the operation, and sat with him morning and evening during his convalescence, listening to the wisdom which fell from those lips, as a pupil listens to a much-loved master. Great was the contrast between the two men, yet the difference did not separate them. Herder was decided, clear, pedagogic; knowing his own aims, and fond of communicating his ideas. Goethe was sceptical and inquiring. Herder rude, sarcastic and bitter; Goethe amiable and infinitely tolerant. The bitterness which repelled so many friends from Herder, could not repel Goethe; it was a peculiarity of his to be at all times able to learn from antagonistic natures; meeting them on the common ground of sympathy, he avoided those subjects on which inevitably they must clash. It is somewhat curious, that although Herder took a great liking to his young friend, and was grateful for his kind attentions, he seems to have had no suspicion of his genius. The only fragment we have of that period, which gives us a hint of his opinion, is in a letter to his bride, dated Feb. 1772: 'Goethe is really a good fellow, only somewhat light and sparrow-like,* for which I incessantly reproach him. He was almost the only one who visited me during my illness in Strasburg whom I saw with pleasure; and I believe I influenced him in more ways than one to his advantage.' His own colossal conceit may have stood between Goethe and himself; or he may have been too conscious of his young friend's defects to think much of his genius. Herder loved only the abstract and ideal in men and things, and was forever criticizing and complaining of the individual, because it did not realize his ideal standard. What Gervinus says of Herder's relation to Lessing, namely, that he loved him when he considered him as a whole, but could never cease plaguing him about details, holds good also of his relation to Goethe through life. Goethe had little of that love of mankind in the abstract, which to Herder, and so many others, seems the substitute for individual love, — which animates philanthropists who are sincere in their philanthropy, even when they are bad husbands, bad fathers, bad brothers, and bad friends. He had instead of this the most overflowing love for individual men. His concrete and affectionate nature was more attracted to men than to abstractions. Those who do not recognize this, may declaim against him for his 'indifference' to political matters, to history, to many of the great questions which affect Humanity; but those who do recognize it will pass another judgment.

* Nur etwas leicht und Spatzenmässig: I translate the phrase, leaving the reader to interpret it, for twenty Germans have given twenty different meanings to the word 'sparrow-like,' some referring to the chattering of sparrows, others to the boldness of sparrows, others to the curiosity of sparrows, and others to the libertine character of sparrows. Whether Herder meant gay, volatile, forward, careless, or amorous, I cannot decide.

Herder's influence was manifold, but mainly in the direction of poetry. He taught him to look at the Bible, as a magnificent illustration of the truth that Poetry is the product of a national spirit, not the privilege of a cultivated few. From the Poetry of the Hebrew people he led him to other illustrations of National Song; and here Homer and Ossian were placed highest. It was at this time that Ossian made the tour of Europe, and everywhere met believers. Goethe was so delighted with the wild northern singer, that he translated the song of 'Selma,' and afterwards incorporated it in Werther. Besides Shakespeare and Ossian, he also learned, through Herder, to appreciate the Vicar of Wakefield; and the exquisite picture there painted, he was now to see living before him in the parsonage of Frederika's father. no

Upon the broad and lofty gallery of the Strasburg Cathedral, he and his companions often met to salute the setting sun with brimming goblets of Rhine wine. The calm wide landscape stretched itself for miles before them, and they pointed out the several spots which memory endeared to each. One spot, above all others, has interest for us: it is Sesenheim, the home of Frederika. Of all the women who enjoyed the distinction of Goethe's love, none seem to me so fascinating as Frederika. Her idyllic presence is familiar to every lover of German literature, through the charming episode of the Autobiography, over which the poet lingered with peculiar delight. The secretary is now living to whom this part of the Autobiography was dictated, and he remembers vividly how much affected Goethe seemed to be as these scenes revisited memory. He dictated walking up and down the room, with his hands behind him ; but at this episode he often stopped in his walk, and paused in the dictation ; then after a long silence, followed by a deep sigh, he continued the narrative in a lower tone.

Weyland, a fellow-boarder, had often spoken of a clergyman who, with his wife and two amiable daughters, lived near Drusenheim, a village about sixteen miles from Strasburg. Early in October, 1770, Weyland proposed to his friend to accompany him on a visit to the worthy pastor. It was agreed between them that Weyland should introduce him under the guise of a shabby theological student. His love of incognito often prompted him to such disguises. In the present instance he borrowed some old clothes, and combed his hair in such a way that when Weyland saw him he burst out into a fit of laughter. They set forth in high glee. At Drusenheim they stopped, Weyland to make himself spruce, Goethe to rehearse his part. Riding across the meadows to Sesenheim, they left their horses at the inn, and walked leisurely towards the parsonage, — an old, and somewhat dilapidated farmhouse, but very picturesque, and very still. They found Herr Brion at home, and were welcomed by him in a friendly manner. The rest of the family were in the fields. Weyland went after them, leaving Goethe to discuss parish interests with the pastor, who soon grew confidential. Presently the wife appeared ; and she was followed by the eldest daughter bouncing into the room, inquiring after Frederika, and hurrying away again to seek her.

Refreshments were brought, and old acquaintances were talked over with Weyland, — Goethe listening. Then the daughter returned, uneasy at not having found Frederika. This little domestic fuss about Frederika prepared the poet for her appearance. At length she came in. Both girls wore the national costume, with its short, white, full skirt and furbelow, not concealing the neatest of ankles, a tight boddice and black taffeta apron. Frederika's straw hat hung on her arm ; and the beautiful braids of her fair hair drooped on a delicate white neck. Merry blue eyes, and a piquant little nez retroussé, completed her attractions. In gazing on this bright young creature, then only sixteen, Goethe felt ashamed of his disguise. It hurt his amour-propre to appear thus before her like a bookish student, shorn of all personal advantages. Meanwhile conversation rattled on between Weyland and the family. Endless was the list of uncles, aunts, nieces, cousins, gossips and guests they had something to say about, leaving him completely excluded from the conversation. Frederika seeing this, seated herself by him, and with charming frankness began to talk to him. Music was lying on the harpsichord ; she asked him if he played, and on his modestly-qualified affirmative begged him to 'favor them.' Her father, however, suggested that she ought to begin, by a song. She sat down to the harpsichord, which was somewhat out of tune, and, in a provincial style, performed several pieces — not of a kind, one may imagine, to enchant our musical generation, but such as then were thought enchanting. After this she began to sing. The song was tender and melancholy, but she was apparently not in the mood, for acknowledging her failure she rose and said, ' If I sing badly it is not the fault of my harpsichord nor of my teacher : let us go into the open air, and then you shall hear my Alsatian and Swiss songs.' Into the air they went, and soon her merry voice carolled forth :

‘I come from a forest as dark as the night,
And believe me, I love thee, my only delight.
Ei ja, ei ja, ei, ei, ei, ei, ja, ja, ja !’ *

He was already a captive !

His tendency to see Pictures and Poetry in the actual scenes of life, here made him see realized the Wakefield family. If Herr Brion did not actually represent Mr. Primrose, yet he might stand for him ; the elder daughter for Olivia, the younger for Sophia ; and when at supper a youth came into the room, Goethe involuntarily exclaimed, ‘What, Moses too !’ A very merry supper they had, so merry that Weyland, fearing lest wine and Frederika should make his friend betray himself, proposed a walk in the moonlight. Weyland offered his arm to Salome, the elder daughter, by Goethe always named Olivia. Frederika took Goethe’s arm. Youth and moonlight, — need one say more ? Already he began to scrutinize her tone in speaking of cousins and neighbors, jealous lest it should betray an affection. But her blithe spirit was as yet untroubled, and he listened in delicious silence to her unembarrassed loquacity.

On retiring for the night the friends had much to talk over. Weyland assured him the incognito had not been betrayed ; on the contrary, the family had inquired after the young Goethe, of whose joviality and eccentricities they had often heard. And now came the tremulous question : was Frederika engaged ? No. That was a relief ! Had she ever been in love ? No. Still better ! Thus chatting, they sat till deep in the night, as friends chat on such occasions, with hearts too full and brains too heated for repose. At dawn Goethe was awake, terribly impatient to see Frederika with the dew of morning on her cheek. While dressing he looked at his costume in horror, and tried in vain to remedy it. His hair could be managed ; but when his arms were thrust into the threadbare coat, the sleeves of which were ludicrously short, he looked pitiable ; Weyland, peeping at him from under the coverlet, giggled. In his despair he resolved to ride back to Strasburg, and return in his own costume. On the way another plan suggested itself. He exchanged clothes with the son of the landlord at the Drusenheim Inn, a youth of his own size ; corked his eyebrows, imitated the son's gait and speech, and returned to the parsonage the bearer of a cake. This second disguise also succeeded, so long as he kept at a distance ; but Frederika running up to him and saying, ' George, what do you here ? ' he was forced to reveal himself. ' Not George, but one who asks forgiveness.' ' You shocking creature ! ' she exclaimed, ' how you frightened me ! ' The jest was soon explained and forgiven, not only by Frederika, but by the family, who laughed heartily at it.

* The entire song is to be found in the Sesenheimer Liederbuch and in Viehoff: Goethe Erläutert, vol. i. p. 110.

Gayly passed the day ; the two youngsters hourly falling deeper and deeper in love. Passion does not chronicle by time : moments are hours, hours years, when two hearts are rushing into one. It matters little, therefore, that the Autobiography speaks of only two days passed in this happy circle, whereas a letter of his says distinctly he was there ' some days — einigen Tagen ' (less than three cannot be understood by einige). He was there long enough to fall in love, and to captivate the whole family by his gayety, obligingness and poetic gifts. He had given them ' a taste of his quality ' as a romancist, by telling the story of The New Melusina (subsequently published in the Wanderjahre), which he promised to write down for them. He had also interested himself in the pastor's plans for the rebuilding of the parsonage, and had taken away the sketches with him to Strasburg.

The pain of separation was lightened by the promise of speedy reunion. He returned to Strasburg with new life in his heart. He had not long before written to a friend that for the first time he knew what it was to be happy without his heart being engaged. Pleasant people and manifold studies left him no time for feeling. 'Enough, my present life is like a sledge-journey, splendid and sounding, but with just as little for the heart as it has much for eyes and ears.' Another tone runs through his letters now, to judge from the only one which has been recovered.* It is addressed to Frederika, dated the 15th October.

'Dear new friend,—

'I dare to call you so; for if I can trust the language of eyes, then did mine in the first glance read the hope of this new friendship in yours—and for our hearts I will answer. You, good and gentle as I know you, will you not show some favor to one who loves you so?

'Dear, dear friend,—

'That I have something to say to you there can be no question; but it is quite another matter whether I exactly know wherefore I now write; and what I may write. Thus much I am conscious of by a certain inward unrest: that I would gladly be by your side, and a scrap of paper is as true a consolation and as winged a steed for me here in noisy Strasburg, as it can be to you in your quiet, if you truly feel the separation from your friend.

'The circumstances of our journey home you can easily imagine, if you marked my pain at parting, and how I longed to remain behind. Weyland's thoughts went forwards, mine backwards ; so you can understand how our conversation was neither interesting nor copious.

* Schöll's Briefe und Aufsätze, p. 51. The letters in Pfeiffer's book are manifest forgeries.

‘ At the end of the Wanzenau we thought to shorten our route, and found ourselves in the midst of a morass. Night came on ; and we only needed the storm which threatened to overtake us, to have had every reason for being fully convinced of the love and constancy of our princesses.*

‘ Meanwhile, the scroll which I held constantly in my hand — fearful of losing it — was a talisman, which charmed away all the perils of the journey. And now ? — oh, I dare not utter it — either you can guess it, or you will not believe it !

‘ At last we arrived, and our first thought, which had been our joy on the road, was the project soon to see you again.

‘ How delicious a sensation is the hope of seeing again those we love ! And we, when our coddled heart is a little sorrowful, at once bring it medicine and say : Dear little heart, be quiet, you will not long be away from her you love ; be quiet, dear little heart ! Meanwhile we give it a chimæra to play with, and then is it good and still as a child to whom the mother gives a doll instead of the apple which it must not eat.

‘ Enough, we are not here, and so you see you were wrong. You would not believe that the noisy gayety of Strasburg would be disagreeable to me after the sweet country pleasures enjoyed with you. Never, Mamsell, did Strasburg seem so empty to me as now. I hope, indeed, it will be better when the remembrance of those charming hours is a little dimmed — when I no longer feel so vividly how good, how amiable my friend is. Yet ought I to forget that, or to wish it? No; I will rather retain a little sorrow and write to you frequently.

* An allusion doubtless intelligible to the person addressed, but I can make nothing of it.

‘And now many, many thanks and many sincere remembrances to your dear parents. To your dear sister many hundred . . . what I would so willingly give you again!’

A few days after his return, Herder underwent the operation previously alluded to. Goethe was constantly with him; but as he carefully concealed all his mystical studies and poetic plans, fearing to have them ridiculed, so one may suppose he concealed also the new passion which deliciously tormented him. In silence he occupied himself with Frederika, and carefully sketched plans for the new parsonage. He sent her books, and received from her a letter, which, of course, seemed priceless.

In November he was again at Sesenheim. Night had already set in when he arrived; his impatience would not suffer him to wait till morning, the more so as the landlord assured him the young ladies had only just gone home, where ‘they expected some one.’ He felt jealous of this expected friend; and he hastened to the parsonage. Great was his surprise to find them not surprised; greater still to hear Frederika whisper, ‘Did I not say so? Here he is!’ Her loving heart had prophesied his coming, and had named the very day.

The next day was Sunday, and many guests were expected. Early in the morning Frederika proposed a walk with him, leaving her mother and sister to look after domestic preparations. Who shall describe that walk, wherein the youthful pair abandoned themselves without coquetry or concealment to what George Sand beautifully calls tous les riens immenses d’un amour naissant? They talked over the expected pleasures of the day, and arranged how to be always together. She taught him several games; he taught her others; and underneath these innocent arrangements Love serenely smiled. The church bell called them from their walk. To church they went, and listened — not very attentively — to the worthy pastor. Another kind of devotion made their hearts devout. He meditated on her charming qualities, and as his glance rested on her ruddy lips, he recalled the last time woman's lips had been pressed to his own; recalled the curse which the excited French girl had uttered, a curse which hitherto had acted like a spell. This superstition not a little troubled him in games of forfeits, where kisses always form a large proportion; and his presence of mind was often tried in the attempts to evade such dreaded osculation; the more so as many of the guests, suspecting the tender relation between him and Frederika, sportively took every occasion to make them kiss. She, with natural instinct, aided him in his evasions. The time came, however, when carried away by the excitement of the dance and games, he felt the burning pressure of her lips crush the superstition in a 'kiss, a long, long kiss of youth and beauty gathered into one.'

He returned to Strasburg, if not a formally betrothed, yet an accepted lover. As such the family and friends seem to have regarded him. Probably no betrothal took place, on account of his youth, and the necessity of obtaining his father's consent. His muse, lately silent, now found voice again, and several of the poems Frederika inspired are to be read in his published works. The whole have been reprinted in the Sesenheimer Liederbuch; and in Viehoff's Goethe Erläutert.

He had been sent to Strasburg, to gain a doctor's degree. His Dissertation had been commenced just before this Sesenheim episode. But Shakespeare, Ossian, Faust, Götz, and, above all, Frederika, scattered his plans, and he followed the advice of friends to choose, instead of a Dissertation, a number of Theses, upon which to hold a disputation. His father would not hear of such a thing, but demanded a regular Dissertation. He chose, therefore, this theme, 'That it is the duty of every law-maker to establish a certain religious worship binding upon clergy and laity.' A theme he supported by historical and philosophical arguments. The Dissertation was written in Latin, and sent to his father, who received it with pleasure. But the dean of the faculty would not receive it — either because its contents were paradoxical, or because it was not sufficiently erudite. In lieu thereof he was permitted to choose Theses for disputation. In the appendix these Theses will be found printed for the curious reader.* The Disputation was held on the 6th of August, 1771, his opponent being Franz Lerse, who pressed him hard. A jovial schmaus, a real students' banquet, crowned this promotion of Dr. Goethe.†

He could find no time for visits to Sesenheim during this active preparation for his doctorate ; but he was not entirely separated from Frederika : her mother had come with both daughters to Strasburg on a visit to a rich relative. He had been for some time acquainted with this family, and had many opportunities of meeting his beloved. The girls, who came in their Alsatian costume, found their cousins and friends dressed like Frenchwomen ; a contrast which greatly vexed Olivia, who felt 'like a maid-servant,' among these fashionable friends. Her restless manners evidently made Goethe somewhat * See Appendix C.

† There is some obscurity on this point. From a letter to Salzmann, it seems he only got a licentiate degree at this time. The doctorate he certainly had ; but when his diploma was prepared is not known.

ashamed of her. Frederika, on the other hand, though equally out of her element in this society, was more self-possessed, and perfectly contented so long as he was by her side. There is in the Autobiography a significant phrase : this visit of the family is called a ‘peculiar test of his love.’ And test it was, as every one must see who considers the relations in which the lovers stood. He was the son of an important Frankfurt citizen, and held almost the position of a nobleman in relation to the poor pastor’s daughter. Indeed, the social disparity was so great, that many explain his not marrying Frederika on the ground of such a match being impossible,—‘his father,’ it is said, ‘would not have listened to such a thing for a moment.’ Love in no wise troubles itself about station, never asks ‘what will the world say?’ but there is a quite different solicitude felt by Love when approaching Marriage. In the first eagerness of passion, a prince may blindly pursue a peasant; but when his love is gratified by return, when reflection reasserts its duties, then the prince will ‘curiously consider’ what will be the estimation of his mistress. Men are very sensitive to the opinion of others on their mistresses and wives; and Goethe’s love must indeed have been put to the test, at seeing Frederika and her sister thus in glaring contrast with the society in which he moved. She was a wood nymph in the groves of Sesenheim; but in the Strasburg salon the wood nymph seemed a peasant. Who is there that has not experienced a similiar destruction of illusion, in seeing an admired person lose almost all charm by a change of environment?

Frederika laid her sweet commands on him one evening, and bade him entertain the company by reading Hamlet aloud. He did so, to the great enjoyment of all, especially Frederika, ‘who from time to time sighed deeply, and a passing color tinged her cheeks." Was she thinking of poor Ophelia — placing herself in that forlorn position?

‘For Hamlet and the trifling of his favor,
Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood!’

She may have had some presentiment of her fate. The applause, however, which her lover gained was proudly accepted by her, ‘and in her graceful manner she did not deny herself the little pride of having shone through him.’

It is quite certain that his passion gave him vague uneasiness. ‘How happy is he,’ he writes, ‘whose heart is light and free! Courage urges us to confront difficulties and dangers, and only by great labor are great joys obtained. That, perhaps, is the worst I have to allege against love. They say it gives courage: never! The heart that loves is weak. When it beats wildly in the bosom and tears fill our eyes, and we sit in an inconceivable rapture as they flow — then, oh! then, we are so weak that flower-chains binds us, not because they have the strength of any magic, but because we tremble lest we break them.’

The mention of Hamlet leads us naturally into the society where he sought oblivion when Frederika quitted Strasburg. Her departure, he confesses, was a relief to him. She herself felt on leaving that the end of their romance was approaching. He plunged into gayety to drown tormenting thoughts. At this time he was much with Lenz, who had come recently to Strasburg, and with him and some other ‘Shakespeare bigots,’ who held to the severest orthodoxy in Shakespeare as a first article of their creed, and who not only maintained the Shakespeare clowns to be incomparable, but strove to imitate them in their language ; many an extravagant jest, and many an earnest discussion served to vary the hours. It is not easy for us to imagine the effect which the revelation of such a mind as Shakespeare's must have produced on the young Germans. The colossal strength, the profundity of thought, the originality and audacity of language, the beauty, pathos, sublimity, wit, and wild overflowing humor, the free movement of life and the accuracy of observation as well as depth of insight into the mysteries of passion and character, were qualities which no false criticism, and, above all, no national taste, prevented Germans from appreciating. It was very different in France. There an established form of art, with which national pride was identified, and an established set of Critical Rules, upon which Taste securely rested, necessarily made Shakespeare appear like a Cyclops of Genuis—a monster, though of superhuman proportions. Frenchmen could not help being 'shocked' at many things in Shakespeare ; yet even those who were most outraged were also most amazed at the 'pearls' to be found upon the 'dung-hill.' In Germany the pearls alone were seen. French taste had been pitilessly ridiculed by Lessing. The French Tragedy had been contrasted with Shakespeare, and pronounced unworthy of comparison. To the Germans, therefore, Shakespeare was a standard borne by all who combated against France, and his greatness was recognized with something of wilful preference. The state of German literature also rendered his influence the more prodigious. Had Shakespeare been first revealed to us when Mr. Hayley was the great laureat of the age, we should have felt something of the eagerness with which the young and ardent minds of Germany received this greatest poet of all ages.

I am fortunately enabled, thanks to Otto Jahn, to give here a very interesting illustration of the enthusiasm with which these young men studied Shakespeare ; and among the new materials this Biography contains, perhaps nothing will be so welcome in England. It is an oration prepared by Goethe for one of the meetings of the Shakespeare-circle before mentioned. To hear the youth of one-and-twenty thus eloquent on his great teacher, lets us intimately into the secret of his mental condition.

ORATION ON SHAKESPEARE.

‘ In my opinion the noblest of our sentiments is the hope of continuing to live, even when destiny seems to have carried us back into the common lot of non-existence. This life, gentlemen, is much too short for our souls ; the proof is, that every man, the lowest as well as the highest, the most incapable as well as the most meritorious, will be tired of anything sooner than of life, and that no one reaches the goal towards which he set out ; for however long a man may be prosperous in his career, still at last, and often when in sight of the hoped-for object, he falls into a grave, which God knows who dug for him, and is reckoned as nothing. Reckoned as nothing ? I ? who am everything to myself, since I know things only through myself ! So cries every one who is truly conscious of himself ; and makes great strides through this life — a preparation for the unending course above. Each, it is true, according to his measure. If one sets out with the sturdiest walking pace, the other wears seven-leagued boots and outstrips him ; two steps of the latter are equal to a day’s journey of the former. Be it as it may with him of the seven-leagued boots, this diligent traveller remains our friend and our companion, while we are amazed at the gigantic steps of the other and admire them, follow his footsteps and measure them with our own.

‘Let us up and be going, gentlemen! To watch a solitary march like this enlarges and animates our souls more than to stare at the thousand footsteps of a royal procession. To-day we honor the memory of the greatest traveller on this journey of life, and thereby we are doing an honor to ourselves. /When we know how to appreciate a merit we have the germ of it within ourselves. /Do not expect that I should say much or methodically; mental calmness is no garment for a festival; and as yet I have thought little upon Shakespeare; to have glimpses and, in exalted passages, to feel, is the utmost I have been able to obtain. The first page of his that I read made me his for life; and when I had finished a single play, I stood like one born blind, on whom a miraculous hand bestows sight in a moment. I saw, I felt, in the most vivid manner, that my existence was infinitely expanded, everything was now unknown to me, and the unwonted light pained my eyes. By little and little I learned to see, and, thanks to my receptive genius, I continue vividly to feel what I have won. I did not hesitate for a moment about renouncing the classical drama. The unity of place seemed to me irksome as a prison, the unities of action and of time burthensome fetters to our imagination; I sprang into the open air, and felt for the first time that I had hands and feet. And now that I see how much injury the men of rule did me in their dungeon, and how many free souls still crouch there, my heart would burst if I did not declare war against them, and did not seek daily to batter down their towers.

‘The Greek drama, which the French took as their model, was both in its inward and outward character such, that it would be easier for a marquis to imitate Alcibiades than for Corneille to follow Sophocles. At first an intermezzo of divine worship, then a mode of political celebration, the tragedy presented to the people great isolated actions of their fathers with the pure simplicity of perfection ; it stirred thorough and great emotions in souls because it was itself thorough and great. And in what souls ? Greek souls ! I cannot explain to myself what that expresses, but I feel it, and appeal for the sake of brevity to Homer and Sophocles and Theocritus ; they have taught me to feel it.

‘ Now hereupon I immediately ask : Frenchman, what wilt thou do with the Greek armor ? it is too strong and too heavy for thee.

‘ Hence, also, French tragedies are parodies of themselves. How regularly everything goes forward, and how they are as like each other as shoes, and tiresome withal, especially in the fourth act, — all this, gentlemen, you know from experience, and I say nothing about it.

‘ Who it was that first thought of bringing great political actions on the stage I know not ; this is a subject which affords an opportunity to the amateur for a critical treatise. I doubt whether the honor of the invention belongs to Shakespeare ; it is enough that he brought this species of drama to the pitch which still remains the highest, for few eyes can reach it, and thus it is scarcely to be hoped that any one will see beyond it or ascend above it. Shakespeare, my friend ! if thou wert yet amongst us, I could live nowhere but with thee ; how gladly would I play the subordinate character of a Pylades, if thou wert Orestes ; yes, rather than be a venerated high-priest in the temple of Delphos.

‘ I will break off, gentlemen, and write more to-morrow, for I am in a strain which, perhaps, is not so edifying to you as it is heartfelt by me.

‘Shakespeare’s dramas are a beautiful casket of rarities, in which the history of the world passes before our eyes on the invisible thread of time. His plots, to speak according to the ordinary style, are no plots, for his plays all turn upon the hidden point (which no philosopher has yet seen and defined), in which the peculiarity of our ego, the pretended freedom of our will, clashes with the necessary course of the whole. But our corrupt taste so beclouds our eyes, that we almost need a new creation to extricate us from this darkness.

‘All French writers, and Germans infected with French taste, even Wieland, have in this matter, as in several others, done themselves little credit. Voltaire, who from the first made a profession of villifying everything majestic, has here also shewn himself a genuine Thersites. If I were Ulysses, his back should writhe under my sceptre. Most of these critics object especially to Shakespeare’s characters. And I cry, nature, nature ! nothing so natural as Shakespeare’s men.

‘There I have them all by the neck. Give me air that I may speak ! He rivalled Prometheus, and formed his men feature by feature, only of collossal size ; therein lies the reason that we do not recognize our brethren ; and then he animated them with the breath of his mind ; he speaks in all of them, and we perceive their relationship.

‘And how shall our age form a judgment as to what is natural ? Whence can we be supposed to know nature, we who, from youth upwards, feel everything within us, and see everything in others, laced up and decorated ? I am often ashamed before Shakespeare, for it often happens that at the first glance I think to myself that I should have done that differently ; but soon I perceive that I am a poor sinner, that nature prophecies through Shakespeare, and that my men are soap-bubbles blown from romantic fancies.

‘And now to conclude, — though I have not yet begun. What noble philosophers have said of the world, applies also to Shakespeare ; — namely, that what we call evil is only the other side, and belongs as necessarily to its existence and to the Whole, as the torrid zone must burn and Lapland freeze, in order that there may be a temperate region. He leads us through the whole world, but we, enervated, inexperienced men, cry at every strange grasshopper that meets us : He will devour us !

‘Up, gentlemen ! sound the alarm to all noble souls who are in the elysium of so-called good taste, where drowsy in tedious twilight they are half alive, half not alive, with passions in their hearts and no marrow in their bones ; and because they are not tired enough to sleep, and yet are too idle to be active, loiter and yawn away their shadowy life between myrtle and laurel bushes.’

In these accents we hear the voice of the youth who wrote Götz with the Iron Hand. If the reader turn to the Autobiography and see there what is said of Shakespeare, he will be able to appreciate what I meant in saying that the tone of the Autobiography is unlike the reality. The tone of this speech is that of the famous Sturm und Drang (storm and stress) period, which in after life became so very objectionable to him. How differently Schiller was affected by Shakespeare may be read in the following confession : — ‘When at an early age I first grew acquainted with this poet, I was indignant at his coldness — indignant with the insensibility which allowed him to jest and sport amidst the highest pathos. Led by my knowledge of more modern poets to seek the poet in his works ; to meet and sympathize with his heart ; to reflect with him over his object ; it was insufferable to me that this poet gave me nothing of himself. Many years had he my reverence — certainly my earnest study, before I could comprehend his individuality. I was not yet fit to comprehend nature at first hand.’

The enthusiasm for Shakespeare naturally incited Goethe to dramatic composition, and, besides Götz and Faust before-mentioned, we find in his Note-book the commencement of a drama on Julius Cæsar.

Three forms rise up from out the many influences of Strasburg into distinct and memorable importance : Frederika ; Herder ; the Cathedral. An exquisite woman, a noble thinker, and a splendid monument, were his guides into the regions of Passion, Poetry, and Art. Herder’s influence was permanent ; that of the Cathedral was soon lost in others. Yet at first it was great enough to make him write the little tractate on German architecture D. M. Erwini à Steinbach ; the enthusiasm of which was so incomprehensible to him in after years, that he was with difficulty persuaded to reprint the tractate among his works. Do we not see here — as in so many other traits — how different the youth is from the child and man ? How thoroughly he had mastered the principles upon which the Strasburg Cathedral was raised may be seen in one simple anecdote. He was considering the cathedral in company with friends, when some one remarked ‘ what a pity it was not finished, and that there was only one tower.’ Upon which Goethe answered, that ‘ it was no less disagreeable to him to see that very tower itself unfinished ; that the four volutes leave off much too abruptly ; that it was evident there should have been four light spires upon them, with a higher one in the centre where the clumsy cross now stands.’ Some one, turning round to him, asked him who told him that ? ‘ The tower itself,’ he answered ; ‘ I have studied it so long, so attentively, and with so much love, that it has at last confessed to me its open secret.' Whereupon his questioner informed him that the tower had spoken truly, and offered to show him the original sketches, which still existed among the archives.

And now he was to leave Strasburg — to leave Frederika. Much as her presence had troubled him of late, in her absence he only thought of her fascinations. He had not ceased to love her, though he already felt she never would be his. He went to say adieu. 'Those were painful days, of which I remember nothing. When I held out my hand to her from my horse, the tears were in her eyes, and I felt sad at heart. As I rode along the footpath to Drusenheim a strange phantasy took hold of me. I saw in my mind's eye my own figure riding towards me, attired in a dress I had never worn — pike gray with silver lace. I shook off this phantasy, but eight years afterwards I found myself on the very road, going to visit Frederika, and that too in the very dress which I had seen myself in, in this phantasm, although my wearing it was quite accidental.' The reader will probably be somewhat sceptical respecting the dress, and will suppose that this prophetic detail was transferred from the fact to the vision by the imagination of later years.*

And so farewell Frederika, bright and exquisite vision of a poet's youth! We love you, pity you, and think how differently we should have treated you! We make pilgrimages to Sesenheim as to Vacluse, and write legibly our names in the Visitor's Album, to testify so much. And we read, not without emotion, narratives such as that of the worthy philologist Näke, who in 1822 made the first pilgrimage,* thinking, as he went, of this enchanting Frederika (and somewhat also of a private Frederika of his own), examined every rood of the ground, dined meditatively at the inn (with a passing reflection that the bill was larger than he anticipated), took coffee with the pastor's successor ; and, with a sentiment touching in a snuffy philologist, bore away a sprig of the jessamine which in days gone by had been tended by the white hands of Frederika, and placed it in his pocket-book as an imperishable souvenir.

* The correspondence with the Frau von Stein contains a letter written by him a day or two after this visit, but, singularly enough, no mention of this coincidence.

* Die Wahlfahrt nach Sesenheim.

BOOK THE THIRD.

STURM UND DRANG.

---

1771 to 1775.

---

‘Es bildet ein Talent sich in der Stille, Sich ein Charakter in der Strom der Welt.’

‘Trunken müssen wir alle seyn :
Jugend ist Trunkenheit ohne Wein.’

‘They say best men are moulded out of faults,
And, for the most, become much more the better
For being a little bad.’ — Shakespeare.

BOOK THE THIRD.

---

CHAPTER I.

DR. GOETHE'S RETURN.

ON the 25th, or 28th, of August 1771, he quitted Strasburg. His way led through Mannheim; and there he was first thrilled at the beauty of ancient masterpieces, some of which he saw in plaster cast. Whatever might be his predilection for Gothic Art, he could not view these casts without feeling himself in presence of an Art in its way also divine; and his previous study of Lessing lent a peculiar interest to the Laokoon group, now before his eyes, Passing on to Mainz he fell in with a young wandering harpist, and what must he do but invite the ragged minstrel to Frankfurt, promising him a public in the Fair, and a lodging in his father's house. It was lucky that he thought of acquainting his mother with this invitation. Alarmed at its imprudence she secured a lodging in the town, and so the boy wanted neither shelter nor patronage.

Rath Goethe was not a little proud of the young Doctor. He was also not a little disturbed by the young Doctor's manners; and often shook his ancient respectable head at the opinions which exploded like bombshells in the midst of conventions. Doctoral gravity was but slightly attended to by this young hero of the Sturm und Drang. The period known as the Storm and Stress period was then about to astonish Germany, and to startle all conventions, by works such as Gerstenberg's Ugolino, Goethe's Götz von Berlichingen, Klinger's Sturm und Drang (from whence the name), and Schiller's Robbers. The wisdom and extravagance of that age united in one stream. The masterly criticisms of Lessing, the enthusiasm for Shakespeare, the mania for Ossian and the northern mythology, the revival of ballad literature, and parodies of Rousseau, all worked in one rebellious current against established authority. There was one universal shout for 'nature.' With the young, nature seemed to be a compound of volcanoes and moonlight; her force was explosion, her beauty sentiment. To be insurgent and sentimental, explosive and lachrymose, were the true signs of genius. Everything established was humdrum. Genius, abhorrent of humdrum, would neither spell correctly, nor write correctly, nor demean itself correctly. It would be German—lawless, rude, and natural. Lawless it was, and rude it was, but whether it was natural, according to the nature of any reputable type, may be doubted.

It is not easy, in the pages of the Autobiography, to detect in Goethe an early leader of the Sturm und Drang; but it is easy enough to detect him as such in other sources. Here is a glimpse, caught in a letter from Mayer of Lindau (one of the Strasburg set) to Saltzmann, worth chapters of the autobiography on such a point. 'O Corydon, Corydon quæ te dementia cepit! According to the chain in which our ideas are linked together, Corydon and dementia put me in mind of the extravagant Goethe. He is still at Frankfurt, is he not?'

That such a youth, whose wildness made friends nickname him the 'bear' and the 'wolf,' could have been wholly pleasing to the steady, formal father, is not to be expected. Yet the worthy sire was not a little proud of his attainments. The verses, essays, notes and drawings which had accumulated during the residence in Strasburg were very gratifying to him. He began to arrange them with scrupulous neatness, hoping to see them shortly published. But the poet had a virtue, perhaps of all virtues the rarest in youthful writers, — a reluctance to appear in print. Seeing, as we daily see, the feverish alacrity with which men accede to that extremely imaginary request, 'request of friends,' and dauntlessly rush into print, — seeing the obstinacy with which they cling to all they have written, and insist on what they have written being printed — Goethe's reluctance demands an explanation. And, if I may interpret according to my own experience, the explanation is, that his delight in composition was rather the pure delight of intellectual activity than a delight in the result: not in the work, but in the working. Thus, no sooner had he finished a poem than his interest in it began to fade; and he passed on to another. Thus it was that he left so many works fragments, his interest having been exhausted before the whole was completed.

He had a small circle of literary friends to whom he communicated his productions, and this was publication enough for him. We shall see him hereafter, in Weimar, writing solely for a circle of friends, and troubling himself scarcely at all about a public. It was necessary for him to occupy himself with some work which should absorb him, as Götz did at this time, for only in work could he forget the anguish and remorse which followed his renunciation of Frederika. If at Strasburg he had felt that an end was approaching to this sweet romance, at Frankfurt, among family connections, and with new prospects widening before him, he felt it still more. He wrote to her. Unhappily that letter is not preserved. It would have made clear much that is now conjectural. 'Frederika's answer,' he says, 'to the letter in which I had bidden her adieu, tore my heart. I now, for the first time, became aware of her bereavement, and saw no possibility of alleviating it. She was ever in my thoughts; I felt that she was wanting to me; and, worst of all, I could not forgive myself! Gretchen had been taken from me; Annchen had left me; but now, for the first time, I was guilty; I had wounded, to its very depths, one of the most beautiful and tender of hearts. And that period of gloomy repentance, bereft of the love which had so invigorated me, was agonizing, insupportable. But man will live; and hence I took a sincere interest in others, seeking to disentangle their embarrassments, and to unite those about to part, that they might not feel what I felt. Hence I got the name of the "Confidant," and also, on account of my wanderings, I was named the "Wanderer." Under the broad open sky, on the heights or in the valleys, in the fields and through the woods, my mind regained some of its calmness. I almost lived on the road, wandering between the mountains and the plains. Often I went, alone or in company, right through my native city as though I were a stranger in it, dining at one of the great inns in the High Street, and after dinner pursuing my way. I turned more than ever to the open world and to Nature; there alone I found comfort. During my walks I sang to myself strange hymns and dithyrambs. One of these, the Wanderer's Sturmlied, still remains. I remember singing it aloud in an impassioned style amid a terrific storm. The burden of this poem is that a man of genius must walk resolutely through the storms of life, relying solely on himself; a burden which seems to give expression to what he then felt respecting his relation to Frederika.

Although we have no exact knowledge of the circumstances, from the height of which to judge his conduct, the question must be put, Why did he not marry Frederika? It is a question often raised, and as often sophistically answered. He is by one party angrily condemned, and disingenuously absolved by another. But he himself acknowledged his fault. He himself never put forth any excuse. He does not hint at disparity of station, he does not say there were objections from his parents. He makes no excuse, but confesses the wrong, and blames himself without sophistication. Yet the excuses he would not suggest, partisans have been eager to suggest for him. They have sought far and wide in the gutters of scandal for materials of defence. One gets up a story about Frederika being seduced by a Catholic priest; whence it is argued that Goethe could not be expected to marry one so frail; whence also it follows, by way of counterblast, that it was his desertion which caused her fall.* The basis of fact on which this lie is reared (there is usually some basis even for the wildest lies), is that Frederika brought up the orphan child of her sister Salome.

Pfeiffer, forgetting that before Goethe knew Merck he had already felt the misgivings which were to issue in a rupture, says that Merck was the cause of the separation; and that he then, as subsequently in the case of Charlotte, interfered to prevent the folly of his friend. Pfeiffer believes Merck played the part assigned to Carlos in Clavigo, who exclaims: — ‘Marry! what, marry just at the time when life opens to you ! To coop yourself at home before you have gone over half your wanderings or accomplished half your conquests ! That you love the girl is natural ; that you promised her marriage was the act of a fool ; but to keep your promise would be the act of a madman.' Hereupon Pfeiffer coolly remarks, 'There is more truth than levity in these words. It is at any rate by no means evident to me that infidelity to his genius would not have been a greater crime than infidelity to his mistress.' A comfortable code for genius lax in its morals, but a code which only moral laxity on the one hand, or literary cant on the other, can pretend to uphold.

* Strangely enough, although Goethe read the MS. in which Nāke repeats this story, he takes no notice of it.

Let me try, without sophistication, to state the real case fairly. I will not suppose the reader a dupe of the cant about 'falsehood to genius' ; but will ask him in all seriousness whether Goethe was not perfectly right to draw back from an engagement which he felt his love was not strong enough properly to fulfil ? It seems to me that he acted a more moral part in relinquishing her, than if he had swamped this lesser in a greater wrong, and escaped the wrong of breach of faith by that still greater breach of faith — a reluctant, because unloving, marriage. The thoughtlessness of youth, and headlong impetus of passion, frequently throw people into rash engagements, and in these cases the formal morality of the world, more careful of externals than of truth, declares it to be nobler for such rash engagements to be kept, even when the rashness is felt by the engaged, than that a man's honor should be stained by a withdrawal. The letter thus takes precedence of the spirit. To satisfy this prejudice a life is sacrificed. A miserable marriage rescues the honor ; and no one throws the burden of that misery upon the prejudice. I am not forgetting the necessity of being stringent against the common thoughtlessness of youth in forming such relations; but I say that this thoughtlessness, once having occurred, reprobate it as you will, the pain which a separation may bring had better be endured, than evaded by an unholy marriage, which cannot come to good.

So far I think Goethe right. Frederika herself must have felt so too, for never did a word of blame escape her; and we shall see how affectionately she welcomed him, when they met after the lapse of years. This, however, does not absolve him from the blame of having thoughtlessly incurred the responsibility of her affection. That blame he must bear. The reader will apportion it according as he estimates the excuses of temperament, and the common thoughtlessness of us all in such matters.

I do not think his love for Frederika was only a passing fancy, such as so often moves the feelings of youth without ever deepening into serious thought of marriage. It was a passion, and she was worthy of it. But a passion deep enough to make marriage desirable, it was not; and there were many reasons why it should not be. One of these reasons has already been suggested. (p. 127.) Another is suggested in the Wanderer's Sturmlied, and the passage from Clavigo, just quoted. He had been charmed by the idyllic grace of this girl; intimacy only strengthened his perception of her good qualities; but intimacy also helped to cool his poetic passion, and made him dimly feel it impossible to blend his many-sided existence with hers. Marriage was a phantom from which he shrunk. Eros, with folded wings and broken bow, was to him an image of fear. The choice lay between a quiet domestic life, and the career which ambition opened. His decision could not long be doubtful.

Without accepting the vague, wild talk about genius and its 'mission,' which runs through the literature of gentlemen and ladies who seem to have a merely 'bowing acquaintance' with genius, one needs only to read the biographies of great men, to perceive that domestic duties seldom have power to shape the career of genius. There is a latent antagonism between domesticity and genius, which sometimes rises into terrible warfare. The affections, even in the affectionate, are powerless against the tyranny of Ideas. What is called the egoism of genius is but another name for tyranny of Ideas. It is this tyranny which lights the stake, which towers into inquisitions, decimates families, embitters nations, makes the kindest natures cruel, the softest pitiless. Thus, Howard could neglect his only child, leaving him in a mad-house, while his 'mission' carried thoughtful benevolence into the prisons of distant lands. Bernard Palissy could see his wife and children perishing, while, with the obstinacy of genius, he pursued his passionate efforts, tearing up the very boards of his cottage to feed the furnace for his experiments.* And was there not a painter who stabbed his brother that he might truly paint the agonies and throes of death? This tyranny coerces greater men. Genius hurries along its relentless path, with something of the fierce beneficence of Nature, working the greatest benefits with instruments of pain.

Genius has an orbit of its own; if it moved through the orbit of commonplace lives it would not be genius, but commonplace. Its orbit is not necessarily eccentric, although it must often appear so, because its sweep is wide. Sometimes it disregards domestic duties and Minor * See Dixon's Life of Howard, and Morley's Life of Bernard Palissy, for abundant evidence of this tyranny. Balzac has wrought the idea into a masterpiece in La Recherche de l'Absolu.

Morals in obeying the law of its own movement. Hence Genius and Morality are not always synonymous ; neither are they antagonistic. Genius is good and great, and, in its greatness and its goodness, seeks the eternal principles of order, — seeks to make life harmonious ; but the slenderest acquaintance with Biography tells us that genius is not always found respecting minor morals, and that the Biographies of men of genius are very unlike ‘moral tales.’ Nor — to bring this reflection to bear upon the question from which we started — are the conjugal chapters in such Biographies by any means the pleasantest to read : Shakespeare, Milton, Dante, Byron, are not easily to be surpassed as poets, but as husbands it would require a race of Griseldas to accept them with any favor.

I believe, then, that the Egoism of Genius, which dreaded marriage as the frustration of a career, had much to do with Goethe's renunciation of Frederika ; not consciously, perhaps, but powerfully. Whether the alarm was justifiable is another question, and is not to be disposed of with an easy phrase. It is mere assumption to say ‘marriage would have crippled his genius.’ Had he loved her enough to share a life with her, his experience of woman might have been less extensive, but it would assuredly have gained an element it wanted. It would have been deepened. He had experienced, and he could paint, (no one better) the exquisite devotion of woman to man ; but he had scarcely ever felt the peculiar tenderness of man for woman, when that tenderness takes the form of vigilant protecting fondness. He knew little, and that not until late in life, of the subtle interweaving of habit with affection, which makes life saturated with love, and love itself become dignified through the serious aims of life. He knew little of the exquisite companionship of two souls striving in emulous spirit of loving rivalry to become better, to become wiser, teaching each other to soar. He knew little of this ; and the kiss, Frederika ! he feared to press upon thy loving lips — the life of sympathy he refused to share with thee — are wanting to the greatness of his works.

In such a mood as that which followed the rupture with Frederika, it is not wonderful if Frankfurt and the practice of law were odious to him. Nothing but hard work could do him good : and he worked hard. We find him working at Götz von Berlichingen, which has become a passion. Gothic Art, a kindred subject, occupies him, and from thence, by an easy transition, he passes to the Bible, to study it anew. The results of this study are seen in two little tractates published in 1773, one called *Brief des Pastor's zu *** an den neuen Pastor zu **** ; the other, Zwo wichtige bisher unerörtete biblische Fragen, zum erstenmal gründlich beantwortet von einem Landgeistlichen in Schwaben. The influence of Fräulein von Klettenberg is here traceable in the religious sentiment and reverence for the Bible ; while his own affectionate nature speaks in the tolerance preached. In the two biblical questions, one goes to prove that it was not the ten commandments which stood on the tables of Moses, but ten laws of the Israelitish-Jehovah covenant. The second is an answer, by no means clear, to the question : — ‘ What is it to speak with tongues ? ’ which he explains as a ‘ speech of the Spirit, more than pantomime, and yet inarticulate.’

Among the friends to whom he communicated his plans and ideas, two must be named : Schlosser, whom we have seen at Leipsic, and Merck, whose influence was very beneficial. The portrait sketched of this remarkable man in the Autobiography gives a very incorrect idea to those who cannot control what is there said by other direct evidence ; especially calculated to mislead is the nickname 'Mephistopheles Merck,' for whatever tendency to sarcasm Merck may have indulged in, it is quite clear that his admiration was generous and warm, his influence over Goethe being uniformly one of friendly incitement, or of friendly warning.

Johann Heinrich Merck was born in Darmstadt, 1741. The son of an apothecary, he raised himself to the companionship of princes. He was at this time Kriegsrath in Darmstadt, and in correspondence with most of the notabilities of the day ; among them Herder, who had the highest opinion of his abilities, and the most jealous anxiety to retain his friendship, fearing lest the new friendship with Goethe should step between them ; as, indeed, eventually it did. Merck, whose significance in the history of German literature is considerable, and whose correspondence shows him to have critically influenced men greatly his superiors in production, was one of the most zealous propagators of English literature. He began by translating Hutcheson On Beauty, Addison's Cato, and Shaw's Travels in the Levant. The Shakespeare neophytes found him prepared to share their enthusiasm ; and when, in 1772, he persuaded Schlosser to undertake the editing of the Frankfurter Gelehrten Anzeigen, and to make it the Moniteur of the Sturm und Drang party, his own contributions were numerous and valuable.* His official duties do not seem to have pressed very heavily upon him, for he makes frequent excursions, and seems to have stayed some time at Frankfurt. The friendship between him and Goethe was warm. He saw more deeply than Herder into this singular genius, and on many critical occasions we find him always manifesting a clear insight, and a real regard.

* See for further information the excellent work of Adolf Stahr: Johann Heinrich Merck. Ein Denkmal.

The Frankfurter Gelehrten Anzeigen was a point of reunion, bringing Goethe into relation with many persons of ability. It also afforded him an opportunity of exercising himself in criticism. Thirty-five of the articles he wrote for this journal have been collected into his works, where the curious student will seek them. Thus engaged, the time flew swiftly. He had recommenced horse and sword exercise, and Klopstock having made skating illustrious, it soon became the amusement of our friends. Goethe was never tired ; all day long and deep into the night he was to be seen wheeling along ; and as the full moon rose above the clouds over the wide nocturnal fields of ice, and the night wind rushed at his face, and the echo of his movements came with ghostly sound upon his ear, he seemed to be in Ossian's world.

It has before been hinted that Sturm und Drang, as it manifested itself in the mind and bearing of the young doctor, was but very moderately agreeable to the old Rath Goethe ; and whatever sympathy we may feel with the poet, yet, as we are all parents, or hope to be, let us not permit our sympathy to become injustice ; let us admit that the old Rath had considerable cause for parental uneasiness, and let us follow the son to Wetzlar without flinging any hard words at his father.

CHAPTER II.

GÖTZ VON BERLICHINGEN.

ALTHOUGH Götz was not published until the spring of 1773, it was written in the winter of 1771, or, to speak more accurately, the first of the three versions into which the work was shaped, was written at this time. We must bear in mind that there are three versions: the first is entitled the Geschichte Gottfriedens von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand, dramatisirt,* which was not published until very many years afterwards. The second is entitled Götz von Berlichingen, Schauspiel,† and is the form in which the work was originally published. The third is an adaptation of this second piece, with a view to stage representation, which adaptation was made with Schiller during the efforts to create a national stage at Weimar.‡

The first form is the one I most admire, and the one which, biographically, has most interest. While he is on his way to Wetzlar we will open his portfolio, and take out this manuscript for closer scrutiny, instead of waiting till he publishes the second version. From a letter to Salzmann we learn that it was written in November, 1771. ‘My whole genius is given to an undertaking which makes me forget Shakespeare, Homer, everything ; I am dramatizing the history of the noblest of Germans, to rescue the memory of a brave man ; and the labor it costs me kills time here, which is at present so necessary for me.' He gives the following account of its composition, in the Autobiography : 'An unceasing interest in Shakespeare's works had so expanded my mind, that the narrow compass of the stage and the short time allotted to a representation, seemed to me insufficient for the development of an important idea. The life of Götz von Berlichingen, written by himself, suggested the historic mode of treatment ; and my imagination took so wide a sweep, that my dramatic construction also went beyond all theatrical limits in seeking more and more to approach life. I had, as I proceeded, talked the matter over with my sister, who was interested heart and soul in such subjects ; and I so often renewed this conversation, without taking any step towards beginning the work, that at last she impatiently and urgently entreated me not to be always talking, but, once for all, to set down upon paper that which must be so distinct before my mind. Moved by this impulse, I began one morning to write, without having made any previous sketch or plan. I wrote the first scenes, and in the evening they were read aloud to Cornelia. She greatly applauded them, but doubted whether I should go on so ; nay, she even expressed a decided unbelief in my perseverance. This only incited me the more ; I wrote on the next day, and also on the third. Hope increased with the daily communications, and step by step everything gained more life as I mastered the conception. Thus I kept on, without interruption, looking neither backwards nor forwards, neither to the right nor to the left ; and in about six weeks I had the pleasure of seeing the manuscript stitched.'

* Werke, vol. xxxiv, of the edition of 1840.

† Werke, vol. ix.

‡ Werke, vol. xxxv.

Gottfried von Berlichingen, surnamed of the Iron Hand, was a distinguished predatory Burgrave of the 16th century ; * one of the last remains of a turbulent, lawless race of feudal barons, whose personal prowess often lends the lustre of romance to acts of brigandage. Gottfried with the Iron Hand was a worthy type of the class. His loyalty was as unshakeable as his courage. Whatever his revered emperor thought fit to do, he thought right to be done. Below the emperor he acknowledged no lord. With his fellow barons he waged continual war. Against the Bishop of Bamberg, especially, he was frequently in arms ; no sooner was a peace arranged with him, than the Bishop of Mainz was attacked. War was his element. With something of Robin Hood chivalry, he was always found on the side of the weak and persecuted ; unless when the Kaiser called for his arm, or unless when tempted by a little private pillage on his own account. To his strong arm the persecuted looked for protection. A tailor owes two hundred florins, and cannot pay them ; he goes to Götz with a piteous tale ; instantly the Iron Hand clutches the two first Cologne merchants travelling that way, and makes them pay the two hundred florins.

It was a tempting subject for a poet of the eighteenth century, this bold chivalrous robber, struggling single-handed against the advancing power of civilization, this lawless chieftain making a hopeless stand against the Law, and striving to perpetuate the feudal spirit. Peculiarly interesting to the poet of that age was the consecration of individual greatness in Götz. Here was a man not great by Privilege but by Nature ; his superiority given him by no Tradition, by no Court Favor, but by favor only of his own strong arm and indomitable spirit. And was not the struggle of the whole eighteenth century a struggle for the recognition of individual worth, of Rights against Privileges, of Liberty against Tradition? Such also was the struggle of the sixteenth century. The Reformation was to Religion what the Revolution was to Politics: a stand against the Tyranny of Tradition — a battle for the rights of individual liberty of thought and action, against the absolute prescriptions of privileged classes.

* Scott by an oversight makes him flourish in the fifteenth century. He was born in 1482, and thus reached man's estate with the opening of the sixteenth century.

In the Chronicle of Götz von Berlichingen his deeds are recorded by himself with unaffected dignity. There Goethe found materials, such as Shakespeare found in Holingshed and Saxo-Grammaticus; and used them in the same free spirit. He has dramatized the Chronicle — made it live and move before us; but he has dramatized a Chronicle, not written a drama. This distinction is drawn for a reason which will presently appear.

Viehoff has pointed out the use which has been made of the Chronicle, and the various elements which have been added from the poet's own invention. The English reader cannot be expected to feel the same interest in such details as the German reader does; it is enough, therefore, to refer the curious to the passage,* and only cite the characters invented by Goethe; these are Adelheid, the glorious, voluptuous, fascinating demon; Elizabeth, the noble wife, in whom Goethe's mother saw herself; Maria, a reminiscence of Frederika; Georg, Franz Lerse, Weislingen, and the Gypsies. The death of Götz is also new.

Götz was a dramatic Chronicle, not a drama. It should never have been called a drama, but left in its original shape with its original title. This would have prevented much confusion ; especially with reference to Shakespeare, and his form of dramatic composition. While no one can mistake the influence of Shakespeare in this work, there is great laxity of language in calling it Shakespearian ; a laxity unanimous enough, but not therefore the more admissible. Critics are judges who rely on precedents with the rigor of judges on the bench. They pronounce according to precedent. That indeed is their office. No sooner has an original work made its appearance, than one of these two courses is invariably pursued : it is rejected by the critics because it does not range itself under any acknowledged class, and thus is branded because it is not an imitation ; or it is quietly classified under some acknowledged head. The latter was the case with Götz von Berlichingen. Because it set the ‘unities’ at defiance, and placed the People beside the Nobles on the scene ; because instead of declamations, as in French tragedy, the persons spoke dramatically to the purpose ; because, in short, it did not range under the acknowledged type of French tragedy, it was supposed to range under the Shakespearian type — the only accepted antagonist to the French !

* Goethe's Leben, vol. ii. pp. 77–79.

Is it like Othello ? Is it like Macbeth ? Is it like Richard III., Henry IV., King John, Julius Cæsar, or any one unquestioned play by Shakespeare ? Unless the words ‘Shakespearian style’ are meaningless, in thus designating Götz people must mean that it resembles Shakespeare’s plays in the structure and organization of plot, in the delineation of character, and in the tone of dialogue ; yet a cursory review of the play will convince any one that in all these respects it is singularly unlike Shakespeare’s plays.

In construction it differs from Shakespeare, first, as intended to represent an epoch rather than a passion ; secondly, as taking the licenses of narrative art, instead of keeping the stage always in view, and submitting to the stern necessities of theatrical representation ; thirdly, as wanting in that central unity round which all the persons and events are grouped, so as to form a work of art. It is a succession of scenes ; a story of episodes.

It was a peculiarity in Goethe's mind to attach itself to Character and Picture, and to remain indifferent to Action or Event. In a story he cared nothing for the Circumstance ; all he asked was a delineation of human nature to satisfy his intellect, and a skilful picture of objects to satisfy his artistic sense. Human nature had more of a psychological than of a passionate attraction for him ; the very passions themselves being interesting to him as problems rather than as emotions. Herein lay the cause of the singular absence in him both of historic feeling and of dramatic power. In history he turned aside from the march of events ; their very grandeur was distasteful to him, because that grandeur dwarfed the human actor, in whom alone his interest was placed.

In the presentation of character the work is no less un-Shakespearian. Our national bigotry, indeed, assumes that every masterly portraiture of character is Shakespearian ; an assumption which can hardly maintain itself in the presence of Sophocles, Racine and Goethe. Each poet has a manner of his own, and Shakespeare's manner is assuredly not visible in Götz von Berlichingen. The characters move before us with singular distinctness in their external characteristics, but they do not, as in Shakespeare, involuntarily betray the inmost secret of their being. We know them by their language and their acts ; we do not know their thoughts, their self-sophistications, their involved and perplexed motives, partially obscured even to themselves, and seen by us in the cross lights which break athwart their passionate utterances. To take a decisive example : Weislingen is at once ambitious and irresolute, well-meaning but weak.* The voice of friendship awakens remorse in him, and forces him to accept the proffered hand of Götz. He swears never again to enter the bishop's palace. But, easily seduced by noble thoughts, he is afterwards seduced as easily by vanity : tempted he falls, turns once more against his noble friend, and dies betrayed and poisoned by the wife to whom he has sacrificed all — dies unpitied by others, despicable to himself. This vacillation is truthful, but not truthfully presented. We who only see the conduct cannot explain it. We stand before an enigma, as in real life ; not before a character such as Art enables us to see, and see through. It is not the business of Art to present enigmas ; and Shakespeare, in his strongest, happiest moods, contrives to let us see into the wavering depths of the souls, while we follow the actions of his characters. Contrast Weislingen with such vacillating characters as Richard II., King John, or Hamlet. The difference is not of degree, but of kind.

Nor is the language Shakespearian. It is powerful, picturesque, clear, dramatic ; but it is not pregnant with thought, obscured in utterance, and heavy with that frequent superfœtation of ideas, which is a characteristic and often a fault in Shakespeare. It has not his redundancy and prodigal imagery. Indeed it is very singular, and as the production of a boy trebly so, in the absence of all rhetorical amplification, and of all delight in imagery for its own sake.

* In his vacillation, Goethe meant to stigmatize his own weakness with regard to Frederika as he tells us in the Wahrheit und Dichtung.

We must cease to judge of it by any standard. It is a dramatic poem which created a revolution by teaching that "for each nation the true classical spirit must be found in the genius of its own Romance : he who would really imitate Homer, must, in the Chronicles of his native land, find out the Heroic Age.*" It was the first-born of the Romantic School, or rather of the tendency from which that school issued ; and its influence has been widespread. It gave the impulse and direction to Scott's historical genius, which has altered our conceptions of the past, and given new life to history. It made the Middle Ages a subject of eager and almost universal interest. It decided the fate of French tragedy in German literature. But its influence on dramatic art has been, I think, more injurious than beneficial, and mainly because the distinction between a dramatized chronicle and a drama has been lost sight of.

This injurious influence is traceable in the excessive importance it has given to local color, and the intermingling of the historic with the dramatic element. Any one at all acquainted with the productions of the Romantic School in Germany or France will understand this. Goethe's object not being to write a drama, but to dramatize a picture of the Middle Ages, local color was of primary importance ; and because he made it so attractive, others have imitated him in departments where it is needless. Nay, critics are so persuaded of its importance, that they strain every phrase to show us that Shakespeare was also a great painter of times ; forgetting that local coloring is an appeal to a critical and learned audience, not an appeal to the heart and imagination. It is history, not drama. Macbeth, in a bag-wig, with a small sword at his side, made audiences tremble at the appalling ruin of a crime-entangled soul. The corrected costume would not make that tragedy more appalling, had we not now grown so critical that we demand historical ‘accuracy,’ where, in the true dramatic age, they only demanded passion. The merest glance at our own dramatic literature will suffice to show the preponderating (and misplaced) influence of History, in the treatment, no less than in the subjects chosen.

*Bulwer, in the Life of Schiller, prefixed to his Translation of Schiller's Poems and Ballads ; a work which has not received the acknowledgment it deserves. Bulwer pays here the penalty of versatility. The admiration of a public is soon fatigued even by works in one direction, but in many directions it will not follow at all !

Götz, as a picture of the times, is an animated and successful work; but the eighteenth century is on more than one occasion rudely thrust into the sixteenth; and on this ground Hegel very arbitrarily denies its originality. ‘An original work appears as the creation of one mind, which, admitting of no external influence, fuses the whole work in one mould, as the events therein exhibited were fused. If it contains scenes and motives which do not naturally evolve themselves from the original materials, but are brought together from far and wide, then the internal unity becomes necessarily destroyed, and these scenes betray the author’s subjectivity. For example, Goethe’s Götz has been greatly lauded for originality, nor can we deny that he has therein boldly trampled under foot all the rules and theories which were then accepted: but the execution is notwithstanding not thoroughly original. One may detect in it the poverty of youth. Several traits, and even scenes, instead of being evolved from the real subject, are taken from the current topics of the day. The scene, for example, between Götz and Brother Martin, which is an allusion to Luther, contains notions gathered from the controversies of Goethe’s own day, when — especially in Germany — people were pitying the monks because they drank no wine, and because they had passed the vows of chastity and obedience. Martin, on the other hand, is enthusiastic in his admiration of Götz, and his knightly career: “When you return back laden with spoils, and say, such a one I struck from his horse ere he could discharge his piece; such another I overthrew, horse and man; and then, returning to your castle, you find your wife.” . . . Here Martin wipes his eye and pledges the wife of Götz. Not so — not with such thoughts did Luther begin, but with quite another religious conviction!’

‘In a similar style,’ Hegel continues, ‘Basedow’s pedagogy is introduced. Children, it was said, learn much that is foolish and unintelligible to them; and the real method was to make them learn objects, not names. Karl thus speaks to his father just as he would have spoken in Goethe’s time from parrot-memory: “Jaxt-hausen is a village and castle upon the Jaxt, which has been the property and heritage for two hundred years of the Lords of Berlichingen.” “Do you know the Lord of Berlichingen?” asks Götz; the child stares at him, and, from pure erudition, knows not his own father. Götz declares that he knew every pass, pathway, and ford about the place, before he knew the name of village, castle or river.’*

Considered with reference to the age in which it was produced, Götz von Berlichingen is a marvellous work: a work of daring power, of vigor, of originality; a work to form an epoch in the annals of letters. Those who now read it as the work of the great Goethe may be somewhat disappointed; but at the time of its appearance no * Hegel’s Vorlesungen über die Ästhetik, i. p. 382.

“magnificent monster” had startled the pedantries and proprieties of the schools; — ‘a piece,’ said the critic in the Teutsche Mercur of the day, ‘wherein the three unities are shamefully outraged, and which is neither a tragedy nor a comedy, and is, notwithstanding, the most beautiful, the most captivating monstrosity.’

The breathless rapidity of movement renders a first reading too hurried for proper enjoyment; but on recurring to the briefly indicated scenes, we are amazed at their fulness of life. How marvellous, for example, is that opening scene of the fifth act (removed from the second version), where Adelheid is in the gypsies’ tent. Amid the falling snow shines the lurid gleam of the gypsy fire, around which move dusky figures; and this magnificent creature, shuddering as she finds herself in the company of an old crone, who tells her fortune, while a wild-eyed boy gazes ardently on her and alarms her with his terrible admiration; the whole scene lives, yet the touches which call it into life are briefer than in any other work I can remember. How powerful also is the scene of the Secret Tribunal! Adelheid has poisoned her husband, and the Vehm-Gericht assembles to hear her accused.* This scene follows:

A NARROW VAULT DIMLY LIGHTED.

(The Judges of the Secret Tribunal seated, muffled in black cloaks, silent.)

The Eldest. Judges of the Secret Tribunal, sworn by cord and sword to be pitiless in justice — in secret to judge, in secret to avenge, like God ! If your hands and hearts are pure, raise your arms to heaven and cry, Woe, woe to the malefactors !

* It is worth noting, that in thus bringing the Vehm-Gericht into his work, he made an historical blunder. That tribunal was expressly forbidden jurisdiction over priests, women, and Jews; over the rest of the world its power was absolute. See Johannes Scherr: Geschichte Deutscher Cultur und Sitte, p. 191.

Omnes. Woe, woe !

Eldest. Cryer, begin.

Cryer. I call for accusation against malefactors ! Whose heart is pure, whose hand is clean, let him accuse, and call upon cord and sword for vengeance ! vengeance ! vengeance !

Accuser (stepping forward). My heart is pure from misdeed, and my hands are clear from innocent blood. God pardon my sins of ignorance, and frame my steps to His ways. I raise my hand aloft and cry for vengeance ! vengeance ! vengeance !

Eldest. Whom dost thou accuse ?

Accuser. I call upon the cord and sword for vengeance upon Adelheid von Weislingen. She has committed adultery and murder. She has poisoned her husband by the hands of his servant : the servant hath slain himself — the husband is dead !

Eldest. Swearest thou by the God of Truth that thy accusation is true ?

Accuser. I swear.

Eldest. Dost thou take upon thy head the punishment of adultery and murder, should it be found false ?

Accuser. I do.

Eldest. Your voices. (Judges converse in low whispers.)

Accuser. Judges of the Secret Tribunal, what is your doom upon Adelheid von Weislingen, accused of murder and adultery ?

Eldest. She shall die ! Shall die a bitter death ! With cord and with sword shall she doubly expiate a double crime. Raise your hands to heaven and call down upon her Woe ! woe ! woe !

Omnes. Woe ! woe ! woe !

Eldest. Avenger, come forth ! (The Avenger advances.) There hast thou cord and sword. Within eight days thou must remove her from before the face of heaven. Judges ! ye that in secret judge and in secret avenge, keep your hearts from wickedness and your hands from innocent blood.'

The gloom and terror which darken this scene fitly prepare the mind for that more awful scene of execution which follows it (also struck out from the second version). Adelheid is in bed, tossing restlessly and sleeplessly ; night is hideous to her, and she pines for the day. 'Is Weislingen dead ?' she murmurs to herself. She rings the bell, but no one hears her. 'Sleep closes their ears ! . . . Is Franz dead ? . . . He was a loveable youth. . . . Ah ! Sickingen ! Sickingen ! . . .' Thus murmuring the name now so dear to her, she closes her murderous retrospect in sleep. The ghost of the murdered Franz appears — calls upon her, and vanishes. The Avenger creeps from under her bed.

Adelheid (awakening). I saw him ! He was struggling with the agonies of death ! — he called upon me ! called upon me. . . . His eyes were filled with love. . . . Ha ! assassin ! assassin !

Avenger. Call not — you call Death ! The spirits of Vengeance will deafen Help.

Adelheid. Do you want gold ? — jewels ? Take them. Only let me live.

Avenger. I am no robber. Darkness has ordained darkness : thou must die.

Adelheid. Woe! woe!

Avenger. On thy head! If the odious phantoms of thy misdeeds draw thee not down to hell, look up — look up to heaven, and pray that the sacrifice I now offer it be enough!

Adelheid. Let me live! What have I ever done to thee? I clasp thy knees.

Avenger (aside). An imperial creature! What a look! What a voice! . . . In her arms I — dog that I am — should be a god. . . . If . . . If I were to deceive her? She is in my power.

Adelheid. He seems moved.

Avenger. Thou weakenest me. . . . Wilt thou grant me . . .

Adelheid. What?

Avenger. . . . That which man can demand of lovely woman in the depth of night.

Adelheid (aside). My cup is full! Crimes and shame encircle me with flames of hell. I expiate! I expiate! . . . Vain, vain to seek to obliterate crimes with crimes — ignominy with ignominy. Dishonor the most infamous, and death the most ignominious, in one hellish picture rise before me!

Avenger. Decide!

Adelheid (aside). A ray of hope! (Goes towards the bed. He follows; she seizes a dagger and stabs him.)

Avenger. Betrayer to the last! (Falls on her and strangles her. Ah! the serpent! (Stabs her.)) . . . I bleed. . . . Thus is thy lust punished! . . . Thou art not the first. . . . God! didst thou make her so lovely, and couldst not thou make her good? (Exit.)

In the simple pathos of the closing scene there is a grandeur worthy of the occasion. All is over with Götz, who, mortally wounded, comes out into the garden of the prison to breathe his last.

Götz. Almighty God! How sweet it is to be under thy heaven! How free! The trees put forth their buds; all the world hopes. Farewell, my children! my buds are crushed, my hope is in my grave!

Elizabeth. Shall I not send Lerse to the cloister for thy son, that thou mayest see and bless him?

Götz. Leave him where he is: he needs not my blessing: he is holier than I. Upon our wedding, Elizabeth, could I have thought I should die thus! . . . Lerse, thy countenance cheers me in the hour of death. As in our most noble fights my spirit encouraged yours; now yours supports mine. Oh, that I could but see George once more, to warm myself in his look! You look down and weep . . . is he dead? George is dead! Then die, Götz! thou hast outlived thyself—outlived the noblest! . . . How died he? Alas! they took him at Millenberg, and he is executed.

Elizabeth. No, he was slain there! He defended his freedom like a lion.

Götz. God be praised! He was the kindest, bravest youth under the sun. Now dismiss my soul. . . . My poor wife! I leave thee in a wretched world. Lerse, forsake her not. Lock your hearts carefully as your doors. The age of frankness and freedom is past; that of treachery begins. The worthless will gain the upperhand by cunning, and the noble will fall into their nets. Maria, God restore thy husband to thee; may he never fall the deeper for having risen so high! Selbitz is dead . . . and the good Kaiser . . . and my George. . . . Give me some water. . . . Heavenly sky! . . . Freedom! freedom! (Dies.)

Elizabeth. Only above . . . above with thee ! . . . The world is a prison.

Maria. Gallant and gentle ! Woe to this age that has lost thee !

Lerse. And woe to the future that misprises thee !

CHAPTER III.

WETZLAR.

IN the spring of 1772 he arrived at Wetzlar, with Götz in his portfolio, and in his head many wild, unruly thoughts. A passage in the Autobiography amusingly illustrates his conception of the task he had undertaken in choosing to inform the world of his early history. Remember that at Wetzlar he fell in love with Charlotte, and lived through the experience which was fused into Werther, and you will smile as you hear him say: ‘What occurred to me at Wetzlar is of no great importance, but it may receive a higher interest if the reader will allow me to give a cursory glance at the history of the Imperial Chamber; in order to present to his mind the unfavorable moment at which I arrived.’ This it is to write autobiography when one has outlived almost the memories of youth, and entirely lost sympathy with its agitations. At the time he was in Wetzlar he would have looked strangely on any one who ventured to tell him that the history of the Imperial Chamber was worth a smile from Charlotte; but at the time of writing his meagre account of Wetzlar he had some difficulty in remembering what Charlotte’s smiles were like. The biographer has a difficult task to make any coherent story out of this episode.*

In Wetzlar there were two buildings interesting above all others to us — the Imperial Court of Justice and the Teutsche Haus. The Imperial Court was a Court of Appeal for the whole empire, a sort of German Chancery. Imagine a German Chancery! In no country known to us does Chancery move with railway speed, and in Germany even the railways are slow. Such a chaotic accumulation of business as this Wetzlar Kammer-Gericht presented was perhaps never seen before. Twenty thousand cases lay undecided on Goethe's arrival, and there were but seventeen lawyers to dispose of them. About sixty was the utmost they could get through in a year, and every year brought more than double that number to swell the heap. Some cases had lingered through a century and a half, and still remained far from a decision. This was not a place to impress the sincere and eminently practical mind of Goethe with a high idea of Jurisprudence.

Das teutsche Haus was one of the remnants of the ancient institution of the Teutsche Ritter, or Teutonic Order of Knighthood, celebrated in German mediæval history, where the student is familiar with the black armor and white mantles of these warrior-priests, who fought with the zeal of missionaries and the terrible valor of knights, conquering for themselves a large territory, and still greater influence. But it fared with them as with the knights of other Orders. Their strength lay in their zeal ; their zeal abated with success. Years brought them increasing wealth, but the spiritual wealth and glory of their cause departed. They became what all Corporations inevitably become, and at the time now written of, they were reduced to a level with the knights of Malta. The Order still possessed property in various parts of Germany, and in certain towns there was a sort of steward's house, where rents were collected and the business of the Order transacted ; this was uniformly styled das teutsche Haus. There was such a one in Wetzlar ; and the Amtmann, or steward, who had superintendence over it, was a certain Herr Buff, on whom the reader is requested to fix his eye, not for any attractiveness of Herr Buff, intrinsically considered, but for the sake of his eldest daughter, Charlotte. She is the heroine of this episode.

* Fortunately, during the very months in which I was rewriting this work, there appeared an invaluable record in the shape of the correspondence between Goethe and Kestner, so often alluded to by literary historians, but so imperfectly known. (Goethe und Werther. Briefe Goethe's, meistens aus seiner Jugendzeit. Herausgegeben von A. Kestner : 1854.) This book, which is very much in need of an editor, is one of the richest sources to which access has been had for a right understanding of Goethe's youth ; and it completes the series of corroborative evidence by which to control the Autobiography.

Nor was this house the only echo of the ancient Ritterthum in Wetzlar. Goethe, on his arrival, found there another, and more consciously burlesque parody, in the shape of a Round Table and its Knights, bearing such names as St. Amand the Opiniative, Eustace the Prudent, Lubomirsky the Combative, and so forth. It was founded by August Friedrich von Goué, Secretary to the Brunswick Embassy, of whom we shall hear more : a wild and whimsical fellow, not without a streak of genius, who drank himself to death. He bore the title of Ritter Coucy, and christened Goethe 'Götz von Berlichingen der Redliche — Götz the Honest.' In an imitation of Werther which Goué wrote,* a scene introduces this Round Table in one of its banquets at the Tavern ; a knight sings a French song, where upon Götz exclaims, 'Thou, a German Ritter, and singest foreign songs !' Another knight asks Götz, 'How far have you advanced with the monument which you are to erect to your ancestor?' Götz replies, 'It goes quietly forward. Methinks it will be a slap in the face to pedants and the public.'*

* Masuren, oder der junge Werther. Ein Trauerspiel aus dem Illyrischen. 1775.

Of this Round Table and its buffooneries, Goethe has merely told us that he entered heartily into the fun at first, but soon wearying of it, relapsed into his melancholy fits. 'I have made many acquaintances,' says Werther, 'but have found no society. I know not what there is about me so attractive that people seek my company with so much ardor. They hang about me, though I cannot walk two steps in their path.' A description of him, written by Kestner at this period, is very interesting, as it gives us faithfully the impression he produced on his acquaintances before celebrity had thrown its halo round his head, and dazzled the perceptions of his admirers.

'In the spring there came here a certain Goethe, by profession † a Doctor Juris, twenty-three years old, only son of a very rich father; in order — this was his father's intention — that he might get some experience in praxi, but according to his own intention, that he might study Homer, Pindar, etc., and whatever else his genius, his manner of thinking, and his heart might suggest to him.

* 'Ein Stück das Meister und Gesellen auf's Maul schlägt.' Cited by Appell: Werther und seine Zeit, p. 38.

† Seiner Handthierung nach. The word is old German, and now fallen out of use, although the verb handthieren is still occasionally used. I notice it for the sake of a correction of orthography, which I owe to Varnhagen von Ense, viz.: that in old Gothic the th is equivalent to d (thus Theoderich becomes Dietrich), hence in handthieren the th is superfluous: it should be handieren, which corresponds with the French word manier.

‘At the very first the beaux esprits here announced him to the public as a colleague, and as a collaborator in the new Frankfurt Gelehrte Zeitung, parenthetically also as a philosopher, and gave themselves trouble to become intimate with him. As I do not belong to this class of people, or rather am not so much in general society, I did not know Goethe until later, and quite by accident. One of the most distinguished of our beaux esprits, the Secretary of Legation Gotter, persuaded me one day to go with him to the village of Garbenheim — a common walk. There I found him on the grass, under a tree, lying on his back, while he talked to some persons standing round him — an epicurean philosopher (von Goué, a great genius), a stoic philosopher (von Kielmansegge), and a hybrid between the two (Dr. König) — and thoroughly enjoyed himself. He was afterwards glad that I had made his acquaintance under such circumstances. Many things were talked of — some of them very interesting. This time, however, I found no other judgment concerning him than that he was no ordinary man. You know that I do not judge hastily. I found at once that he had genius, and a lively imagination; but this was not enough to make me estimate him highly.

(( ‘Before I proceed further, I must attempt a description of him, as I have since learned to know him better.

‘He has a great deal of talent, is a true genius and a man of character; possesses an extraordinarily vivid imagination, and hence generally expresses himself in images and similes. He often says, himself, that he always speaks figuratively, and can never express himself literally; but that when he is older he hopes to think and say the thought itself as it really is.

‘He is ardent in all his affections, and yet has often great power over himself. His manner of thinking is noble: he is so free from prejudices that he acts as it seems good to him, without troubling himself whether it will please others, whether it is the fashion, whether conventionalism allows it. All constraint is odious to him.

‘He is fond of children, and can occupy himself with them very much. He is bizarre, and there are several things in his manners and outward bearing which might make him disagreeable. But with children, women, and many others, he is nevertheless a favorite.

‘He has a great respect for the female sex. In principiis he is not yet fixed, and is still striving after a sure system.

‘To say something of this, he has a high opinion of Rousseau, but is not a blind worshipper of him.

‘He is not what is called orthodox. Still this is not out of pride or caprice, or for the sake of making himself a rôle. On certain important subjects he opens himself to few, and does not willingly disturb the contentment of others in their own ideas.

‘It is true he hates scepticism, strives after truth and after conviction on certain main points, and even believes that he is already convinced as to the weightiest; but as far as I have observed, he is not yet so. He does not go to church or to the sacrament, and prays seldom. For, says he, I am not hypocrite enough for that.

‘Sometimes he seems in repose with regard to certain subjects, sometimes just the contrary.

‘He venerates the Christian religion, but not in the form in which it is presented by our theologians.

‘He believes in a future life, in a better state of existence.

‘He strives after truth, yet values the feeling of truth more than the demonstration.

‘He has already done much, and has many acquirements, much reading; but he has thought and reasoned still more. He has occupied himself chiefly with the belles lettres and the fine arts, or rather with all sorts of knowledge, except that which wins bread.'

On the margin of this rough draught, Kestner adds: 'I wished to describe him, but it would be too long a business, for there is much to be said about him. In one word, he is a very remarkable man.'

Further on: 'I should never have done, if I attempted to describe him fully.' //

The Gotter referred to at the opening of this letter was a young man of considerable culture, with whom Goethe became intimate over renewed discussions on Art and Criticism. 'The opinions of the Ancients,' he says, 'on these important topics, I had studied by fits and starts for some years. Aristotle, Cicero, Quintilian, Longinus — none were neglected, but they did not help me, for they presupposed an experience which I needed. They introduced me to a world infinitely rich in works of Art; they unfolded the merits of great poets and orators, and convinced me that a vast abundance of objects must lie before us ere we can think upon them — that we must accomplish something, nay fail in something, before we can learn our own capacities and those of others. My knowledge of much that was good in ancient literature was merely that of a schoolboy, and by no means vivid. The most splendid orators, it was apparent, had formed themselves in life, and we could never speak of them as artists without, at the same time, mentioning their personal peculiarities. With the poets this was perhaps less the case; but everywhere Nature and Art came in contact only through life. And thus the result of all my investigations was my old resolution to study Nature, and to allow her to guide me in loving imitation.'

Properly to appreciate this passage we must recall the almost universal tendency of the Germans to construct poems in conformity with definite rules, making the poet but a development of the critic. Lessing nobly avowed that he owed all his success to his critical sagacity; Schiller, it is notorious, hampered his genius by fixing on his Pegasus the leaden wings of Kant's philosophy; and Klopstock himself erred in too much criticism. Goethe was the last man to disdain the rich experience of centuries, the last man to imagine that ignorance was an advantageous basis for a poet to stand upon, but he was too thoroughly an artist not to perceive the insufficiency of abstract theories in the production of a work of art which should be the expression of real experience. Art is not impersonal like science, and therefore cannot be taught; Art is nourished not by theory but by life.

In conjunction with Gotter he translated Goldsmith's 'Deserted Village,' though he speaks slightly of his share in it. Through Gotter's representations he was also persuaded to publish some little poems in Boie's Annual. 'I thus* came into contact with those,' he says, 'who, united by youth and talent, always effected so much in various ways. Bürger, Voss, Hölty, the two Counts Stolberg, and several others grouped round Klopstock; and in this poetical circle, which extended itself more and more, there was developed a tendency which I know not exactly how to name. One might call it that need of independence which always arises in times of peace — that is to say precisely when, properly speaking, one is not dependent. In war we bear restraints of force as well as we can ; we are physically, but not morally wounded ; the restraint disgraces no one ; it is no shame to serve the time ; we grow accustomed to suffering both from foes and friends ; we have wishes rather than definite views. On the contrary, in times of peace our love of freedom becomes more and more prominent, and the greater our freedom, the more we wish for it ; we will tolerate nothing above us ; we will not be restrained ; no one shall be restrained ! This tender, sometimes morbid feeling, assumes in noble souls the form of justice : such a spirit then manifested itself everywhere ; and because but few were oppressed, it was wished to free these from occasional oppression. And thus arose a certain moral contest between individuals and the government, which, however laudable its origin, led to unhappy results. Voltaire, revered for his conduct in the affair of Calas, had excited great attention ; and in Germany, Lavater's proceedings against the Landvogt (sheriff of the province), had perhaps been even more striking. The time was approaching when dramatists and novelists sought their villains among ministers and official persons ; hence arose a world, half real, half imaginary, of action and reaction, in which the most violent accusations and instigations were made by writers of periodical journals, under the garb of justice, who produced the more powerful effect because they made the public imagine that it was itself the tribunal — a foolish notion, as no public has an executive power ; and in Germany, dismembered as it was, public opinion neither benefited nor injured any one.'

* Düntzer, in his Studien, has thrown doubts on this connection with the Göttingen school having originated in Wetzlar. But the point is of no importance, and Goethe's own version is left undisturbed in the text.

It was a period of deep unrest in Europe ; the travail of the French revolution. In Germany the spirit of the revolution issued from the study and the lecture hall ; it was a literary and philosophic insurrection, with Lessing, Klopstock, Kant, Herder, and Goethe, for leaders. Authority was everywhere attacked, because everywhere it had shown itself feeble, or tyrannous. The majestic peruke of Louis XIV. was lifted by an audacious hand, which thus revealed the baldness so long concealed. No one now believed in that Grand Monarque ; least of all Goethe, who had Götz von Berlichingen in his portfolio, and to whom Homer and Shakespeare were idols. ‘Send me no more books,’ writes Werther, ‘I will no longer be led, incited, spurred by them. There is storm enough in this breast. I want a cradle-melody, and that I have in all its fulness in Homer. How often do I lull with it my raging blood to rest !’ The Kestner correspondence proves, what before was known, that Werther is full of biography, and that Goethe was then troubled with fits of terrible depression following upon days of the wildest animal spirits. He was fond of solitude, reading, or making sketches of the landscape in his rough imperfect style. ‘A marvellous serenity has descended on my spirit,’ writes Werther, ‘to be compared only to the sweet mornings of spring which so charm my heart. I am alone, and here life seems delicious in this spot formed for natures like mine. I am so happy, so filled with the calm feeling of existence, that my art suffers. I cannot sketch, yet never was I a greater painter than at this moment ! When the dear valley clothes itself in vapor, and the sun shines on the top of my impenetrable forest and only a few gleams steal into its sanctuary, while I lie stretched in the tall grass by the cascade, curiously examine the many grasses and weeds, and contemplate the little world of insects with their innumerable forms and colors, and feel within me the presence of the Almighty who formed us after his own image, the breath of the All-loving who sustains us in endless bliss,—my friend, when my eyes are fixed on all these objects, and the world images itself in my soul like the form of a beloved, then I yearn and say: Ah! couldst thou but express that which lives within thee, that it should be the mirror of thy soul, as thy soul is the mirror of the Infinite God!’

He had come to Wetzlar with the arrow in his breast. The image of Frederika pursued him. It could only be banished by the presence of another. ‘When I was a boy,’ he prettily says in a letter to Salzmann, ‘I planted a cherry-tree, and watched its growth with delight. Spring frost killed the blossoms, and I had to wait another year before the cherries were ripe—then the birds ate them; another year the caterpillars—then a greedy neighbor—then the blight. Nevertheless, when I have a garden again, I shall again plant a cherry-tree!’ He did so:

‘And from Beauty passed to Beauty, Constant to a constant change.’ *

The image which was to supplant that of Frederika was none other than that of the Charlotte Buff, before mentioned. Two years before his arrival, her mother had died. The care of the house and children devolved upon her. She was only sixteen, yet good sense, housewifely aptitude, and patient courage, carried her successfully through this task. She had for two years been betrothed to Kestner, Secretary to the Hanoverian Legation, then aged four-and-twenty: a quiet, orderly, formal, rational, cultivated man, possessing great magnanimity, as the correspondence proves, and a dignity which is in nowise represented in the Albert of Werther, from whom we must be careful to distinguish him, in spite of the obvious identity of position. How Goethe came to know Kestner has already been seen; how he came to know Lotte may now be told.* The reader with Werther in hand may compare the narrative there given with this extract from Kestner's letter to a friend. 'It happened that Goethe was at a ball in the country where my maiden and I also were. I could only come late, and was forced to ride after them. My maiden, therefore, drove there in other society. In the carriage was Dr. Goethe, who here first saw Lottchen. He has great knowledge, and has made Nature in her physical and moral aspects his principal study, and has sought the true beauty of both. No woman here had pleased him. Lottchen at once fixed his attention. She is young, and although not regularly beautiful, has a very attractive face. Her glance is as bright as a spring morning, and especially it was so that day, for she loves dancing. She was gay, and in quite a simple dress. He noticed her feeling for the beauty of Nature, and her unforced wit, — rather humor than wit. He did not know she was betrothed. I came a few hours later; and it is not our custom in public to testify anything beyond friendship to each other. He was excessively gay (this he often is, though at other times melancholy); Lottchen quite fascinated him, the more so because she took no trouble about it, but gave herself wholly to the pleasure of the moment. The next day, of course, Goethe called to inquire after her. He had seen her as a lively girl, fond of dancing and pleasure; he now saw her under another and a better aspect, — in her domestic quality.

* Lotte and Lottchen, it is perhaps not altogether superfluous to add, are the favorite diminutives of Charlotte.

To judge from her portrait, Lotte must, in her way, have been a charming creature : not intellectually cultivated, not poetical, — above all, not the sentimental girl we have in Werther, but a serene, calm, joyous, open-hearted German maiden, an excellent housewife, and a priceless manager. Goethe at once fell in love with her. An extract from Kestner's account will tell us more. After describing his engagement to Lotte, he adds, — ‘She is not strictly a brilliant beauty, according to the common opinion ; to me she is one : she is, notwithstanding, the fascinating maiden who might have hosts of admirers, old and young, grave and gay, clever and stupid, etc. But she knows how to convince them quickly that their only safety must be sought in flight or in friendship. One of these, as the most remarkable, I will mention, because he retains an influence over us. A youth in years (twenty-three), but in knowledge, and in the development of his mental powers and character, already a man, an extraordinary genius, and a man of character, was here, — as his family believed, for the sake of studying the law, but in fact to track the footsteps of Nature and Truth, and to study Homer and Pindar. He had no need to study for the sake of a maintenance. Quite by chance, after he had been here some time, he became acquainted with Lottchen, and saw in her his ideal : he saw her in her joyous aspect, but was soon aware that this was not her best side : he learned to know her also in her domestic position, and, in a word, became her adorer. It could not long remain unknown to him that she could give him nothing but friendship ; and her conduct towards him was admirable. Our coincidence of taste, and a closer acquaintance with each other, formed between him and me the closest bond of friendship. Meanwhile, although he was forced to renounce all hope in relation to Lottchen, and did renounce it, yet he could not, with all his philosophy and natural pride, so far master himself as completely to repress his inclination. And he has qualities which might make him dangerous to a woman, especially to one of susceptibility and taste. But Lottchen knew how to treat him so as not to encourage vain hope, and yet make him admire her manner towards him. His peace of mind suffered: there were many remarkable scenes, in which Lottchen's behavior heightened my regard for her; and he also became more precious to me as a friend; but I was often inwardly astonished that love can make such strange creatures even of the strongest and otherwise the most self-sustained men. I pitied him, and had many inward struggles; for, on the one hand, I thought that I might not be in a position to make Lottchen so happy as he would make her; but, on the other hand, I could not endure the thought of losing her. The latter feeling conquered, and in Lottchen I have never once been able to perceive a shadow of the same conflict.'

Another extract will place this conflict in its true light. 'I am under no further engagement to Lottchen than that under which an honorable man stands when he gives a young woman the preference above all others, makes known that he desires the like feeling from her, and when she gives it, receives from her not only this, but a complete acquiescence. This I consider quite enough to bind an honorable man, especially when such a relation lasts several years. But in my case there is this in addition, that Lottchen and I have expressly declared ourselves, and still do so with pleasure, without any oaths and asseverations.' This absence of any legal tie between them must have made Kestner's position far more trying. It gives a higher idea both of his generous forbearance and of the fascination exercised by Goethe : for what a position ! and how much nobility on all sides was necessary to prevent petty jealousies ending in a violent rupture ! Certain it is that the greatest intimacy and the most affectionate feelings were kept up without disturbance. Confident in the honor of his friend and the truth of his mistress, Kestner never spoiled the relation by a hint of jealousy. Goethe was constantly in Lotte's house, where his arrival was a jubilee to the children, who seized hold of him, as children always take loving possession of those who are indulgent to them, and forced him to tell them stories. It is a pleasant sight to see Goethe with children ; he always shows such hearty fondness for them ; and these brothers and sisters of Lotte were doubly endeared to him because they belonged to her.

One figure in this Wetzlar set arrests our attention : it is that of a handsome blonde youth, with soft blue eyes and a settled melancholy of expression. His name is Jerusalem, and he is the son of the venerable Abbot of Riddagshausen.* He is here attached as Secretary to the Brunswick Legation, a colleague, therefore, of Von Goué. He is deeply read in English literature, and has had the honor of Lessing's friendship ; a friendship subsequently expressed in the following terms, when Lessing, acting as his editor, wrote the preface to his Philosophical Essays : ' When he came to Wolfenbüttel he gave me his friendship. I did not enjoy it long, but I cannot easily name one who in so short a space of time excited in me more affection. It is true I only learned to know one side of his nature, but it was the side which explains all the rest.

* No Catholic, as this title might seem to imply, but a good Protestant ; his Abbey, secularized two centuries before, yielded him only a title and revenues.

It was the desire for clear knowledge ; the talent to follow truth to its last consequences ; the spirit of cold observation ; but an ardent spirit not to be intimidated by truth. . . How sensitive, how warm, how active this young inquirer was, how true a man among men, is better known to more intimate friends.' The Essays which these words introduce are five in number ; the titles are given below.*

The melancholy of his disposition led him to think much of suicide, which he defended on speculative grounds. And this melancholy and these meditations were deepened by an unhappy passion for the wife one of his friends. The issue of that passion we shall have to narrate in a future chapter. For the present it is enough to indicate the presence of this youth among the circle of Goethe's acquaintances. They saw but little of each other, owing to the retiring sensitiveness of Jerusalem ; probably the same cause kept them asunder years before in Leipsic, where they were fellow-students ; but their acquaintance was enough to furnish Goethe with material which he was afterwards to use in his novel.

Jerusalem's unhappy passion and Goethe's unhappy passion, one would think, must have been a bond of union between them ; but in truth Goethe's passion can scarcely have been called 'unhappy'—it was rather a deliciously uneasy passion. Love, in the profound, absorbing, headlong sense, it was not. It was an imaginative passion, in which the poet was more implicated than the man. Lotte excited his imagination ; her beauty, her serene gayety, her affectionate manners, charmed him ; the romance of his position heightened the charm, by giving an unconscious security to his feelings. I am persuaded that if Lotte had been free, he would have fled from her as he fled from Frederika. In saying this, however, I do not mean that the impossibility of obtaining her gave him any comfort. He was restless, impatient, and, in a certain sense, unhappy. He believed himself to be desperately in love with her, when in truth he was only in love with the indulgence of the emotions she excited; a paradox which will be no mystery to those acquainted with the poetic temperament.

* I. Dass die Sprache dem ersten Menschen durch Wunder nicht mitgetheilt sein kann. II. Ueber die Natur und den Ursprung der allgemeinen und abstrakten Begriffe. III. Ueber die Freiheit. IV. Ueber die Mendelssohnsche Theorie vom sinnlichen Vergnügen. V. Ueber die vermischten Empfindungen.

Thus passed the summer. In August he made a little excursion to Giessen, to see Professor Höpfner, one of the active writers in the Frankfurter Gelehrten Anzeigen. Characteristically he calls on the professor incognito, presenting himself as a shy awkward student; which, as Höpfner only knows him through correspondence, is facile enough. The comic scene ends by his jumping into the professor's arms, exclaiming, 'I am Goethe!' Here, in Giessen, he found Merck. He persuaded him to return to Wetzlar, to be introduced to Lotte. Merck came; but so far from undervaluing her, as the very inaccurate account in the Autobiography would have us understand, Merck wrote to a friend: 'J'ai trouvé aussi l'amie de Goethe, cette fille dont il parle avec tant d'enthousiasme dans toutes ses lettres. Elle mérite réellement tout ce qu'il pourra dire du bien sur son compte.'* He concealed this admiration from Goethe, however, and exasperated him by preferring the 'Juno form' of one of her friends, and pointing her out as the more worthy of attention, because she was disengaged. That Goethe should have been offended, was in the order of things; but in the retrospective glance which he gave to this period in his old age, he ought to have detected the really friendly spirit animating Merck; he ought not to have likened him to Mephistopheles; the more so as Merck's representations were really effectual, and hastened the dénouement. Every day made Goethe's position less tenable. At last he consented to tear himself away, and accompany Merck in a trip down the Rhine. It was time. Whatever factitious element there may have been in his passion, the situation was full of danger; indulgence in such emotions would have created at last a real and desperate passion; there was safety but in flight.

* Briefe aus dem Freundeskreise von Goethe, Herder, Merck, p. 59.

Merck left Wetzlar, having arranged that Goethe should join him at Coblenz. The following extracts from Kestner's Diary will remind the reader of Goethe's departure from Leipsic without saying adieu to Käthchen. His dislike of 'scenes' made him shrink from those emotions of leave-taking usually so eagerly sought by lovers.

'Sept. 10th, 1772. To-day Dr. Goethe dined with me in the garden; I did not know that it was the last time. In the evening Dr. Goethe came to the teutsche Haus. He, Lottchen, and I, had a remarkable conversation about the future state; about going away and returning, etc., which was not begun by him, but by Lottchen. We agreed that the one who died first should, if he could, give information to the living, about the conditions of the other life. Goethe was quite cast down, for he knew that the next morning he was to go.'

'Sept. 11th, 1772. This morning at seven o'clock Goethe set off without taking leave. He sent me a note with some books. He had long said that about this time he would make a journey to Coblenz, where the paymaster of the forces, Merck, awaited him, and that he would say no good-byes, but set off suddenly. So I had expected it. But that I was, notwithstanding, unprepared for it, I have felt — felt deep in my soul. In the morning I came home. “Herr Dr. Goethe sent this at ten o’clock.” I saw the books and the note, and thought what this said to me — “He is gone!” — and was quite dejected. Soon after, Hans* came to ask me if he were really gone? The Geheime Räthin Langen had sent to say by a maid-servant: “It was very ill-mannered of Dr. Goethe to set off in this way, without taking leave.” Lottchen sent word in reply: “Why had she not taught her nephew better?” Lottchen, in order to be certain, sent a box which she had of Goethe’s, to his house. He was no longer there. In the middle of the day the Geheime Räthin Langen sent word again: “She would, however, let Dr. Goethe’s mother know how he had conducted himself.” Every one of the children in the teutsche Haus was saying: “Dr. Goethe is gone!” In the middle of the day I talked with Herr von Born, who had accompanied him, on horseback, as far as Brunnfels. Goethe had told him of our evening’s conversation. Goethe had set out in very low spirits. In the afternoon I took Goethe’s note to Lottchen. She was sorry about his departure; the tears came into her eyes while reading. Yet it was a satisfaction to her that he was gone, since she could not give him the affection he desired. We spoke only of him; indeed, I could think of nothing else, and defended the manner of his leaving, which was blamed by a silly person; I did it with much warmth. Afterwards I wrote him word what had happened since his departure.’

How graphically do these simple touches set the whole situation before us; the sorrow of the two lovers at the departure of their friend, and the consternation of the children on hearing that Dr. Goethe is gone ! One needs such a picture to re-assure us that the episode, with all its strange romance, and with all its danger, was not really a fit of morbid sentimentalism. Indeed, had Goethe been the sentimental Werther he has represented, he would never have had the strength of will to tear himself from such a position. He would have blown his brains out, as Werther did. On the other hand, note what a worthy figure is this of Kestner, compared with the cold Albert of the novel. A less generous nature would have rejoiced in the absence of a rival, and forgotten, in its joy, the loss of a friend. But Kestner, who not only knew his friend was his rival,— and such a rival, that doubts crossed him whether this magnificent youth were not really more capable of rendering Lotte happy than he himself was,—grieved for the absence of his friend !

* One of Lotte’s brothers.

Here is Goethe's letter, referred to in the passage just quoted from the Diary :

‘He is gone, Kestner ; when you get this note he is gone ! Give Lottchen the enclosed. I was quite composed, but your conversation has torn me to pieces. At this moment I can say nothing to you but farewell. If I had remained a moment longer with you I could not have restrained myself. Now I am alone, and to-morrow I go. O my poor head !’

This was the enclosure, addressed to Lott :

‘I certainly hope to come again, but God knows when ! Lotte, what did my heart feel while you were talking, knowing, as I did, that it was the last time I should see you ? Not the last time, and yet to-morrow I go away. He is gone ! What spirit led you to that conversation ? When I was expected to say all I felt, alas ! what I cared about was here below, was your hand, which I kissed for the last time. The room, which I shall not enter again, and the dear father who saw me to the door for the last time. I am now alone, and may weep ; I leave you happy, and shall remain in your heart. And shall see you again ; but not to-morrow is never ! Tell my boys, He is gone. I can say no more.'

CHAPTER IV.

PREPARATIONS FOR WERTHER.

HAVING sent his luggage to the house of Frau von Laroche, where he was to meet Merck, he made the journey down the Lahu, on foot. The banks of that river charmed his eye, and helped to relieve the sadness which he felt at thus bidding adieu to his romance. The vine-clad heights, the misty valleys, and the towering castles, solicited his pencil. The old desire of becoming a painter, which haunted him through life, now rose within him. There is a psychological curiosity in noting this long persistence of a desire in one so destitute of the faculty which usually awakens the desire. In spite of this absence of faculty, the desire tormented him during many years, and now rose up in such a serious shape, that he resolved to settle forever whether he should devote himself to the art or not. The test was curious. The river glided beneath, now flashing in the sunlight, now partially concealed by willows. Taking a knife from his pocket, he flung it with his left hand into the river, having previously resolved that if he saw it fall he was to become an artist; but if the sinking knife were concealed by the willows he was to abandon the idea. No ancient oracle was ever more ambiguous than the answer now given him. The willows concealed the sinking knife, but the water splashed up like a fountain, and was distinctly visible. So indefinite an answer left him in doubt.*

He wandered pleasantly on the banks till he reached Ems, and then journeyed down the river in a boat. The old Rhine opened upon him ; and he mentions with peculiar delight the magnificent situation of Oberlahnstein, and above all the majesty of the castle of Ehrenbreitstein. On arriving at the house of Geheimrath von La Roche, where he had been announced by Merck, he was most kindly received by this excellent family, wherein he was soon considered as a member. His literary tendencies bound him to the mother ; his joyousness and strong sense, to the father ; his youth and poetry, to the daughters. The Frau von Laroche, Wieland's earliest love, had written a novel in the Richardson style, Die Geschichte des Fräuleins von Sternheim ; and Schäfer remarks that she probably gathered Merck, Goethe, and others into her house with a view to favorable criticisms of this novel. If this were her design, she succeeded with Goethe, who reviewed her book in the Frankfurter Gelehrten Anzeigen. Whether this complaisance was extorted by herself, or by the charms of her daughter Maximiliane, history saith not ; certain it is that the dark eyes of the daughter made an impression on the heart of the young reviewer. She is the Mlle. B.

* This mode of interrogating fate recalls that strange passage in Rousseau's Confessions (Livre vi.), where he throws a stone at a tree: if he hits, it is a sign of salvation; if he misses, of damnation! Fortunately he hits: 'Ce qui, véritablement, n'était pas difficile, car j'avais eu le soin de le choisir fort gros et fort près; depuis lors je n'ai plus douté de mon salut.' Had Goethe read this passage? The Confessions appeared in 1768, that is, four years before this journey down the Lahn. Yet from a passage in one of his letters to the Frau von Stein, it seems as if he then, 1782, first read the Confessions.

introduced in Werther ; but she is even still more interesting to us as the future mother of Bettina. They seem to have looked into each other's eyes, flirted and sentimentalized, as if no Lotte had been left in Wetzlar. Nor will this surprise those who have considered the mobile nature of our poet. He is miserable at moments, but the fulness of abounding life, the strength of victorious will, and the sensibility to new impressions, keep his ever active nature from the despondency which killed Werther. He is not always drooping because Charlotte is another's. He is open to every new impression, serious or gay. Thus, among other indications, we find him throwing off in Pater Brey and Satyros, sarcasm and humor which are curious as products of the Werther period, although of no absolute worth ; and we follow him down the Rhine, in company with Merck and his family, leisurely enjoying Rheinfels, St. Goar, Bacharach, Bingen, Elfeld, and Biberich, —

‘ The blending of all beauties ; streams and dells,
Fruit, foliage, crag, wood, corn-field, mountain, vine,
And chiefless castles, breathing stern farewells
From gray but leafy walls where Ruin greenly dwells ’ — sketching as if life were a leisure summer day.

He returned to Frankfurt, and busied himself with law, literature and painting. Wandering Italians, then rare, brought casts of antique statues to Frankfurt ; and with delighted eagerness he purchased a complete set, thus to revive as much as possible the grand impression he received at Mannheim. Among his art-studies must be noted the attention bestowed on the Dutch painters. He began to copy some still-life pictures ; one of these he mentions with pride, and what, think you, this one was ? — a copy of a tortoiseshell knife-handle inlaid with silver ! He has Götz von Berlichingen in his portfolio, and delights in copying a knife-handle !

To law he devoted himself with greater assiduity than ever. His father, delighted at going through the papers with him, was peculiarly gratified at this honorable diligence, and in his delight was willing to overlook the other occupations of ‘this singular creature,’ as he rightly named him. Goethe’s literary plans were numerous, and the Frankfurt Journal gave him constant opportunities for expressing himself on poetry, theology and even politics. Very significant is the following passage from one of these articles in reply to the complaint that the Germans had no Fatherland, no Patriotism : ‘When we have a place in the world where we can repose with our property, a field to nourish us, and a house to cover us, have we not there our Fatherland? and have not thousands upon thousands in every city got this? and do they not live happy in their limited sphere? Wherefore, then, this vain striving for a sentiment we neither have nor can have, a sentiment which only in certain nations, and in certain periods, is the result of many concurrent circumstances? Roman patriotism! God defend us from it, as from a giant! we could not find the stool upon which to sit, nor the bed on which to lie in such patriotism?’ Through life he seems to have been misled by this sophism. It is noticed here as a detail of his mind at this period; a period, be it observed, when, if ever, he may be supposed ardent in patriotism, since he was then re-writing Götz von Berlichingen. He found, on re-reading the manuscript, that, besides the unities of time and place, he had sinned against the higher unity of composition. He says, —

‘In abandoning myself to my imagination, I had not deviated much in the beginning, and the first acts were pretty much as had been intended. In the following acts, however, and especially towards the end, I was unconsciously led away by a singular passion. In making Adelheid so loveable, I had fallen in love with her myself, — my pen was unconsciously devoted to her alone, — the interest in her fate gained the preponderance ; and as, moreover, Götz, towards the end, has little to do, and afterwards only returns to an unhappy participation in the Peasant War, nothing was more natural than that a charming woman should supplant him in the mind of the author, who, casting off the fetters of art, thought to open a new field. I was soon sensible of this defect, or rather this culpable superfluity, since my poetical nature always impelled me to unity. Instead of the biography of Götz and German antiquities, I now confined my attention to my own work, to give it more and more historical and national substance, and to cancel that which was fabulous or passionate. In this I indeed sacrificed much, as the inclination of the man had to yield to the conviction of the artist. Thus, for instance, I had placed Adelheid in a terrific nocturnal gypsy scene, where she produced a great effect by her beautiful presence. A nearer examination banished her ; and the love affair between Franz and his gracious lady, which was very circumstantially carried on in the fourth and fifth acts, was much condensed, and only the chief points indicated.

‘ Without altering the manuscript, which I still possess in its original shape, I determined to rewrite the whole, and did this with such activity, that in a few weeks I produced an entirely new version. It had never been my intention to have the second poem printed, as I looked upon this likewise as no more than a preparatory exercise, the foundation of a new work, to be accomplished with greater industry and deliberation.

‘ When I suggested my plans to Merck, he laughed at me, and asked what was the meaning of this perpetual writing and rewriting? The work, he said, by this means, only becomes different, and seldom better; you must see what effect one thing produces, and then try something new. "Be in time at the hedge, if you would dry your linen," he exclaimed in the words of the proverb; hesitation and delay only make uncertain men. On the other hand, I pointed out how unpleasant it would be to offer a bookseller a work on which I had bestowed so much affection, and perhaps have it refused; for how would they judge of so young, nameless, and audacious an author? As my dread of the press gradually vanished, I wished to see printed my comedy Die Mitschuldigen, upon which I set some value, but I found no publisher inclined to undertake it.

'Here the mercantile taste of my friend was at once excited. He proposed that we should publish at our own expense this singular and striking work, from which we should derive large profit. Like many others, he used often to reckon up the bookseller's profit, which with many works was certainly great, especially if what was lost by other writings and commercial affairs was left out of the calculation. We settled that I should procure the paper, and that he should answer for the printing. To work we went, and I was pleased to see my wild dramatic sketch in clean proof sheets; it looked really better than I myself expected. We completed the work, and it was sent off in several parcels. It was not long before the attention it excited became universal. But as, with our limited means, the copies could not be forwarded, a pirated edition suddenly made its appearance. As, moreover, there could be no immediate return, especially in ready money, for the copies sent out, and as my treasury was not very flourishing at the time when much attention and applause was bestowed upon me, I was extremely perplexed how to pay for the paper by means of which I had made the world acquainted with my talent. On the other hand, Merck, who knew better how to help himself, was certain that all would soon come right again; but I never perceived that to be the case.'

There is some slight inaccuracy in the foregoing, which a comparison of the first and second versions of the work will rectify. The changes he effected were very slight, and mainly consist in the striking out of the two scenes in which Adelheid plays so conspicuous a part. Merck's active sympathy and decision in this matter stand in pleasing contrast with Herder's strange want of insight, or, shall we say, jealous unfriendliness? It was surely not a work to be returned with mocking discouragement, and by a man like Herder. What, then, was the reason of Herder's conduct? Was it want of appreciation, or was it offended self-love which rose against the masterpiece of the youth whom he had depreciated at Strasburg? It is hard to say. If critical sagacity was at fault, the fact is more remarkable, because on its appearance Götz met with almost universal applause, even from critics whose taste was most opposed to such lawless novelties.* The effect on the public was instantaneous, startling. Its bold expression of the spirit of Freedom, its defiance of French criticism, and the originality no less than the power of the writing, carried it triumphant over Germany. It was pronounced a masterpiece in all the salons and in all the beer-houses of that uneasy time. Imitations followed with amazing rapidity; and the stage was noisy with the clang of chivalry, the book shelves creaked beneath the weight of resuscitated Middle Ages.

* This has been ably set forth by Stahr in his work on Merck. What Goethe says on the subject is very far from accurate.

An amusing example of 'the trade' is mentioned by Goethe. A bookseller paid him a visit, and with the air of a man well satisfied with his proposal, offered to give an order for a dozen plays in the style of Götz, for which a handsome honorarium should be paid. His offer was the more generous, because such was the state of literature at this period, that, in spite of the success Götz achieved, it brought no money to its author, pirated editions circulating everywhere, and robbing him of his reward. Moreover, what the bookseller proposed was what the public expected. Foolish public! When once a writer has achieved success in any direction, he must continue in that direction, or peril his reputation. An opinion has been formed of him; he has been classed; and the public will not have its classification disturbed. Nevertheless, if he repeat himself, this unreasoning public declaims against his 'poverty.' No man ever repeated himself less than Goethe. He did not model a statue, and then amuse himself with taking casts of it in different materials. He lived, thought and suffered; and because he had lived, thought and suffered, he wrote. When he had once incarnated experience in song, he never recurred to it. The true artist, like the snake, casts his skin, but never resumes it. He works according to the impulse from within, not according to the demand from without. And Goethe was a genuine artist, never exhausting a lucky discovery, never working an impoverished vein. Every poem came fresh from life, coined from the mint of his experience.

Götz is the greatest product of the Sturm und Drang movement. As we before hinted, this period is not simply one of Titanic hopes and mediæval retrospections, it is also one of unhealthy sentimentalism. Goethe, the great representative poet of his day — the Secretary of his Age — gives us masterpieces which characterize both these tendencies. Beside the insurgent Götz stands the dreamy Werther. And yet, accurately as these two works represent two active tendencies of that time, they are both far removed above the perishing extravagances of that time; they are both ideal expressions of the age, and as free from the disease which corrupted it as Goethe himself was free from the weakness of his contemporaries. Wilkes used to say that he had never been a Wilkite. Goethe was never a Werther. To appreciate the distance which separated him and his works from his sentimental contemporaries and their works, we must study the characters of such men as Jacobi, Klinger, Wagner, and Lenz, or we must read such works as Woldemar. It will then be plain why Goethe turned with aversion from such works, his own included, when a few years had cleared his insight, and settled his aims. Then also will be seen the difference between Genius which idealizes the spirit of the age, and Talent which panders to it.*

It was, indeed, a strange epoch; the unrest was the unrest of disease, and its extravagances were morbid symptoms. In the letters, memoirs and novels, which still remain to testify to the follies of the age, may be read a self-questioning and sentimental introspection, enough to create in healthy minds a distaste both for sentiment and self-questioning. A factitious air is carried even by the most respectable sentiments; and many not respectable array themselves in rose-pink. Nature is seldom spoken of but in hysterical enthusiasm. Tears and caresses are prodigally scattered, and upon the slightest provocations. In Coburg an Order of Mercy and Expiation is instituted by sensitive noodles. Leuchsenring, whom Goethe satirized in Pater Brey, as a professional sentimentalist, gets up a secret society, and calls it the Order of Sentiment, to which tender souls think it a privilege to belong. Friendship is fantastically deified ; brotherly love draws trembling souls together, not on the solid grounds of affection and mutual service, but on entirely imaginary grounds of ‘ spiritual communion ; ’ whence arose, as Jean Paul wittily says, ‘ an universal love for all men and beasts — except reviewers.’ It was a sceptical epoch, in which everything established came into question. Marriage, of course, came badly off among a set of men who made the first commandment of genius to consist in loving your neighbor and your neighbor’s wife.

† As Karl Grün epigrammatically says of Goethe and his contemporaries, 'he was at once patient and physician, they were patients and nothing else.'

These were symptoms of disease ; the social organization was out of order ; a crisis, evidently imminent, was heralded by extravagance in literature, as elsewhere. The cause of the disease was want of Faith. In religion, in philosophy, in politics, in morals, this eighteenth century was ostentatious of its disquiet and disbelief. The old Faith, which for so long had made European Life an organic unity, and which in its tottering weakness had received a mortal blow from Luther, was no longer universal, living, active, dominant, its place of universal directing power was vacant ; a new Faith had not arisen. The French Revolution was another crisis of that organic disturbance which had previously shown itself in another order of ideas, — in the Reformation. Beside this awful crisis, other minor crises are noticeable. Everywhere the same Protestant spirit breaks through traditions in morals, in literature and in education. Whatever is established, whatever rests on tradition, is questioned. The classics are no longer believed in ; men begin to maintain the doctrine of Progress, and the superiority of the moderns. Art is pronounced to be in its nature progressive. Education is no longer permitted to pursue its broad traditional path ; the methods which were excellent for the past no longer suffice for the present ; everywhere new methods rise up to ameliorate the old. The divine right of institutions ceases to gain credence. The individual claimed and proclaimed his freedom ; freedom of thought and freedom of act. Freedom is the watchword of the eighteenth century.

Enough has been said to indicate the temper of those times, and to show why Werther was the expression of that temper. Turning to the novel itself, we find it so bound up with the life of its author, that the history of his life at this epoch is the record of the materials from which it was created ; we must, therefore, retrace our steps again to the point where Goethe left Wetzlar, and, by the aid of his letters to Kestner, follow the development of this strange romance.

Götz was published in the spring of 1773. It was in the autumn of 1772 that Goethe left Wetzlar, and returned home. His letters to Kestner and Charlotte are full of passionate avowals and tender reminiscences. The capricious orthography and grammar, which will be noticed in them, belonged to a period when it was thought unworthy of a genius to conform to details so fastidious as correct spelling or good grammar ; but the affectionate nature which warms these letters, the abundant love the writer felt and inspired, these belong to him, and not to his age. If a proof were wanted of Goethe's loving disposition, we might refer to these letters, especially those addressed to the young brother of Charlotte. The reader of this Biography, however, will need no such proof, and we may therefore confine ourselves to the relation of Goethe to the Kestners. ‘God bless you, dear Kestner,’ runs one of the early letters, ‘and tell Lotte that I often believe I can forget her ; but then I have a relapse, and it is worse with me than ever.’ He longs once more to be sitting at her feet, letting the children clamber over him. He writes in a strain of melancholy, which is as much poetry as sorrow ; when a thought of suicide arises, it is only one among the many thoughts which hurry through his mind. There is a very significant passage in the Autobiography, which aptly describes his real state of mind : ‘I had a large collection of weapons, and among them a very handsome dagger. This I placed by my bedside every night, and before extinguishing my candle, I made various attempts to pierce the sharp point a couple of inches into my breast ; but not being able to do it, I laughed myself out of the notion, threw aside all hypochondriacal fancies, and resolved to live.’ He played with suicidal thoughts, because he was restless, and suicide was a fashionable speculation of the day ; but whoever supposes these thoughts of suicide were serious, has greatly misunderstood him. He had them not, even at this period ; and when he wrote Werther he had long thrown off even the faint temptation of poetic longings for death. In October, 1772, the report reaches him that his Wetzlar friend, Goué, has shot himself : ‘Write to me at once about Goué,’ he says to Kestner ; ‘I honor such an act, and pity mankind, and let all the Philisters make their tobacco-smoke comments on it and say : There, you see ! Nevertheless, I hope never to make my friends unhappy by such an act, myself.’ He was too full of life to do more than coquette with the idea of death. Here is a confession : ‘I went to Homburg, and there gained new love of life, seeing how much pleasure the appearance of a miserable thing like me can give such excellent people.’ On the 7th of November he suddenly appeared in Wetzlar with Schlosser, and stayed there till the 10th, in a feverish, but delicious, enthusiasm. He writes to Kestner on reaching home : ‘ It was assuredly high time for me to go. Yesterday evening I had thoroughly criminal thoughts as on the sofa . . . . And when I think how above all my hopes your greeting of me was, I am very calm. I confess I came with some anxiety. I came with a pure, warm, full heart, dear Kestner, and it is a hell-pain when one is not received in the same spirit as one brings. But so—God give you a whole life such as those two days were to me !’

The report of Goué’s suicide, before alluded to, turned out to be false ; but the suicide of Jerusalem was a melancholy fact. Goethe immediately writes to Kestner :

‘ The unhappy Jerusalem ! The news was shocking, and unexpected to me ; it was horrible to have this news as an accompaniment to the pleasantest gift of love. The unfortunate man ! But the devil, that is, the infamous men who enjoy nothing but the chaff of vanity, and have the lust of idolatry in their hearts, and preach idolatry, and cramp healthy nature, and overstrain and ruin the faculties, are guilty of this misery, of our misery. If the cursed parson is not guilty, God forgive me that I wish he may break his neck like Eli. The poor young man ! When I came back from a walk, and he met me in the moonlight, I said to myself, he is in love. Lotte must still remember that I laughed about it. God knows, loneliness undermined his heart, and for seven years* his form has been familiar to me. I have talked little with him. When I came away I brought with me a book of his ; I will keep that and the remembrance of him as long as I live.’

* This ‘ seven years ’ refers to the first sight of Jerusalem at Leipsic.

Among the many inaccuracies of the Autobiography, there is one of consequence on the subject of Werther, namely, the assertion that it was the news of Jerusalem's suicide which suddenly set him to work. The news reached him in October, 1772, and in November Kestner sent him the narrative of Jerusalem's last days. Not until 1774 did he write Werther. In fact, the state of his mind at this period is by no means such as the Autobiography describes. Read this letter written in December: 'That is wonderful! I was about to ask if Lenchen* had arrived, and you write to tell me she is. If I were only there I would nullify your discourse, and astonish all the tailors; I think I should be fonder of her than of Lotte. From the portrait she must be an amiable girl, much better than Lotte, if not precisely the . . . And I am free and thirsting for love. I must try and come; yet that would not help me. Here am I once more in Frankfurt, and carry plans and fancies about with me, which I should not do if I had but a maiden.' In January he seems to have found a maiden, for he writes: 'Tell Lotte there is a certain maiden here whom I love heartily, and whom I would choose before all others if I had any thought of marriage, and she also was born on the 11th of January.† It would be pretty; such a pair! Who knows what God's will is.' I fancy he here alludes to Anna Sybilla Münch, of whom we shall hear presently; but there is some doubt possible, as she was not born in January but in July. It may be Antoinette Gerock, a relation of Schlosser's, who is known to have loved him passionately, and to have furnished some traits for Mignon. But a doubt is thrown on this latter supposition by a passage in the next letter, wherein he speaks of having helped to adorn his friend for a ball, to which he did not accompany her, but walked with Antoinette on the bridge in the moonlight. Clear, however, it is that he is not very melancholy. 'Yesterday I skated from sunrise to sunset. And I have other sources of joy which I can't relate. Be comforted that I am almost as happy as people who love, like you too, that I am as full of hope, and that I have lately felt some poems. My sister greets you, my maiden also greets you, my gods greet you.' Thus we see, that, although Lotte's picture hangs by his bedside, although her image hovers constantly before him, and the Teutsche Haus is the centre of many yearning thoughts, he is not pining despondently for Charlotte. He has rewritten Götz, and allowed Merck to carry it to the printers. He is living in a very merry circle, one figure in which is Anna Sybilla Münch, as we gather from a letter written in February, 1773, a month after that in which he refers to 'his maiden.' Here is the passage: 'At Easter I will send you a quite adventurous novelty.* My maiden greets Lotte. In character she has much of Lenchen, and my sister says resembles her portrait. If we but as much in love as you two — meanwhile I call her my "dear little wife," for recently she fell to me in a lottery as my wife.' She was then only fifteen, and their relation, which appears never to have been very passionate, was at present mere play.

* A sister of Charlotte's.

† Lotte's birthday.

And now the day approaches when Lotte is to be married and leave Wetzlar. He writes to her brother Hans, begging him, when Lotte departs, to write at least once a week, that the connection with the Teutsche Haus may not be broken, although its jewel is carried away. He writes to Kestner to be allowed to get the wedding ring. 'I am wholly yours, but from henceforth care not to see you nor * Götz.

Lotte. Her portrait too shall away from my bedroom the day of her marriage, and shall not be restored till I hear she is a mother; and from that moment a new epoch begins, in which I shall not love her but her children, a little indeed on her account, but that's nothing to do with it; and if you ask me to be godfather, my spirit shall rest upon the boy, and he shall make a fool of himself for a maiden like his mother.' Enclosed was this note to Lotte: 'May my memory with this ring forever remain with you in your happiness. Dear Lotte, some time hence we shall see each other again, you with this ring on your finger, and I as always thine. I know no name or bye-name to sign this with. You know me.' When the marriage takes place he writes to Kestner. 'God bless you; you have surprised me. I had meant to make a holy sepulchre on Good Friday, and bury Lotte's portrait. But it hangs still by my bed, and shall remain there till I die. Be happy. Greet for me your angel, and Lenchen; she shall be the second Lotte, and it shall be as well with her. I wander in the desert where no water is, my hair is my shade, and my blood my spring.' The bridesmaid brings him the bridal bouquet, a flower of which he sticks in his hat, as he walks to Darmstadt, in a melancholy mood; but to show that his passion for Charlotte was after all only a poetic passion, here is a passage in the letter he sent to Kestner immediately after the marriage: 'O Kestner, when have I envied you Lotte in the human sense? for not to envy you her in the spiritual sense I must be an angel without lungs and liver. Nevertheless I must disclose a secret to you. That you may know and behold. When I attached myself to Lotte, and you know that I was attached to her from my heart, Born talked to me about it, as people are wont to talk. "If I were K. I should not like it. How can it end? You quite cut him out!" and the like. Then I said to him in these very words, in his room, it was in the morning: "The fact is, I am fool enough to think the girl something remarkable; if she deceived me, and turned out to be as girls usually are, and used K. as capital in order to make the most of her charms, the first moment which discovered that to me, the first moment which brought her nearer to me, would be the last of our acquaintance," and this I protested and swore. And between ourselves, without boasting, I understand the maiden somewhat, and you know how I have felt for her and for everything she has seen and touched, and wherever she has been, and shall continue to feel to the end of the world. And now see how far I am envious, and must be so. For either I am a fool, which it is difficult to believe, or she is the subtlest deceiver, or then — Lotte, the very Lotte of whom we are speaking.' A few days afterwards he writes: 'My poor existence is petrified to barren rock. This summer I lose all. Merck goes. My sister too. And I am alone.'

The marriage of Cornelia, his much-loved sister, was to him a very serious matter, and her loss was not easily supplied. It came, too, at a time when other losses pained him. Lotte was married, Merck was away, and a dear friend had just died. Nevertheless he seems to have been active in plans. Among them was most probably that of a drama on Mahomet, which he erroneously places at a later period, after the journeys with Lavater and Basedow, but which Schäfer, very properly, restores to the year 1773, as Boie's Annual for 1774 contains the Mahomet's song, — all that was written, except the plan. Goethe has narrated in full the conception of this piece, which is very grand; he tells us the idea arose within him of illustrating the sad fact, noticeable in the biographies of genius, that every man who attempts to realize a great idea comes in contact with the lower world, and must place himself on its level in order to influence it, and thus compromises his higher aims and finally forfeits them. He chose Mahomet as the illustration, never having regarded him as an imposter. He had carefully studied the Koran and Mahomet's life, in preparation. 'The piece,' he says, 'opened with a hymn sung by Mahomet alone under the open sky. He first adores the innumerable stars as so many gods ; but as the star god (Jupiter) rises, he offers to him, as the king of the stars, exclusive adoration. Soon after, the moon ascends the horizon, and claims the eye and heart of the worshipper, who, refreshed and strengthened by the dawning sun, is afterwards stimulated to new praises. But these changes, however delightful, are still unsatisfactory, and the mind feels that it must rise still higher, and mounts therefore to God, the One Eternal, Infinite, to whom all these splendid but finite creatures owe their existence. I composed this hymn with great delight ; it is now lost, but might easily be restored as a cantata, and is adapted for music by the variety of its expression. It would, however, be necessary to imagine it sung according to the original plan, by the leader of a caravan with his family and tribe ; and thus the alternation of the voices and the strength of the chorus would be secured.

'Mahomet converted, imparts these feelings and sentiments to his friends ; his wife and Ali become unconditional disciples. In the second act, he attempts to propagate this faith in the tribe ; Ali still more zealously. Assent and opposition display themselves according to the variety of character. The contest begins, the strife becomes violent, and Mahomet flies. In the third act, he defeats his enemies, makes his religion the public one, and purifies the Kaaba from idols ; but this being impracticable by force, he is obliged to resort to cunning. What in his character is earthly increases and developes itself; the divine retires and is obscured. In the fourth act, Mahomet pursues his conquests, his doctrine becomes a means rather than an end, all kinds of practices are employed, nor are horrors wanting. A woman, whose husband has been condemned by Mahomet, poisons him. In the fifth act he feels that he is poisoned. His great calmness, the return to himself and to his better nature, make him worthy of admiration. He purifies his doctrine, establishes his kingdom, and dies.

‘This sketch long occupied my mind; for, according to my custom, I was obliged to let the conception perfect itself before I commenced the execution. All that genius, through character and intellect, can exercise over mankind, was therein to be represented, and what it gains and loses in the process. Several of the songs to be introduced in the drama, were rapidly composed; the only one remaining of them, however, is the Mahomet’s Gesang. This was to be sung by Ali, in honor of his master, at the apex of his success, just before the change resulting from the poison.’ Of all his unrealized schemes, this causes me the greatest regret. In grandeur, depth, and in the opportunities for subtle psychological unravelment of the mysteries of our nature, it was a scheme peculiarly suited to his genius. How many Clavigos and Stellas would one not have given for such a poem?

This Mahomet it is, if my suspicion be correct, to which he refers in a letter to Kestner, July, 1773: ‘I am working my experience into a drama for the consolation of gods and men. I know what Lotte will say when she sees it, and I know what I shall answer her.’ If this does not refer to Mahomet it must refer to Werther; but in this case we must place the composition of Werther earlier than other evidence would indicate, and reject his statement that it was written in four weeks of uninterrupted excitement.

Maximiliane Laroche had recently married Brentano, a Frankfurt merchant, a widower with five children, and many years her senior. Goethe became intimate at their house ; and, as Merck writes, ‘il joue avec les enfans et accompagne le clavecin de madame avec la basse. M. Brentano, quoique assez jaloux pour un Italien, l’aime et veut absolument qu’il fréquente la maison.’ The husband wanted his presence, often as an umpire in the disputes with his wife ; and the wife, also, chose him umpire with her husband ; nay, Merck hints, ‘il a la petite Madame Brentano à consoler sur l’odeur de l’huile, du fromage, et des manières de son mari.’ So passed autumn and winter, in a tender relation, such as in those days was thought blameless enough, but such as modern writers cannot believe to have been so blameless. For my part, I cannot disbelieve his own word on this matter, when he says, ‘My former relation to the young wife, which was, properly speaking, only that of a brother to a sister, was resumed after marriage. Being of her own age, I was the only one in whom she heard an echo of those voices to which she had been accustomed in her youth. We lived in childish confidence ; and, although there was nothing passionate in our intercourse, it was painful, because she was unable to reconcile herself to her new condition.’ If not passionate, the relation was certainly sentimental and dangerous. Hear how he writes to Frau Jacobi : ‘It goes well with me, dear lady, and thanks for your double, triple letter. The last three weeks there has been nothing but excitement, and now we are as contented and happy as possible. I say we, for since the 15th of January not a branch of my existence has been solitary. And Fate, which I have so often vituperated, is now courteously entitled beautiful, wise Fate, for since my sister left me, this is the first gift that can be called an equivalent. The Max is still the same angel whose simple and darling qualities draw all hearts towards her, and the feeling I have for her — wherein her husband would find cause for jealousy — now makes the joy of my existence. Brentano is a worthy fellow, with a frank, strong character, and not without sense. The children are lively and good.’ An anecdote, related by his mother to Bettina, gives us an amusing picture of him parading before Max. The morning was bright and frosty. ‘Wolfgang burst into the room where his mother was seated with some friends: “Mother, you have never seen me skate, and the weather is so beautiful to-day.” I put on my crimson fur cloak, which had a long train, and was closed in front by golden clasps, and we drove out. There skated my son, like an arrow among the groups. The wind had reddened his cheeks, and blown the powder out of his brown hair. When he saw my crimson cloak he came towards our carriage and smiled coaxingly at me. “Well,” said I, “what do you want?” “Come, mother, you can’t be cold in the carriage, give me your cloak.” “You won’t put it on, will you.” “Certainly.” I took it off, he put it on, threw the train over his arm, and away he went over the ice like a son of the gods. Oh, Bettina, if you could have seen him! Anything so beautiful is not to be seen now! I clapped my hands for joy. Never shall I forget him, as he darted out from under one arch of the bridge and in again under the other, the wind carrying the train behind him as he flew! Your mother, Bettina, was on the ice, and all this was to please her.’

No thought of suicide in that breast!

Quite in keeping with this anecdote is the spirit of the satirical farce Götter, Helden und Wieland, which is alluded to in this passage of a letter to Kestner, May, 1774, and must therefore have been written some time before: 'My rough joke against Wieland makes more noise than I thought. He behaves very well in the matter, as I hear, so that I am in the wrong.' The origin of this farce was a strong feeling in the circle of Goethe's friends, that Wieland had modernized, misrepresented, and traduced the Grecian gods and heroes. One Sunday afternoon 'the rage for dramatizing everything' seized him, and with a bottle of Burgundy by his side he wrote off the piece just as it stands. The friends were in raptures with it. He sent it to Lenz, then at Strasburg, who insisted on its at once being printed. After some demurring, consent was given, and at Strasburg the work saw the light. In reading it, the public, unacquainted with the circumstances and the mood to which it owed its origin, unacquainted also with the fact of its never having been designed for publication, felt somewhat scandalized at his alcoholic fierceness of sarcasm. But in truth there was no malice in it. Flushed with the insolence and pride of wit, he attacked a poet whom, on the whole, he greatly loved; and Wieland took no offence at it, but reviewed it in the Teutsche Mercur, recommending it to all lovers of pasquinade, persiflage, and sarcastic wit. This reminds one of Socrates standing up in the theatre when he was lampooned by Aristophanes, that the spectators might behold the original of the sophist they were hooting on the stage. Götter, Helden und Wieland is really amusing, and under the mask of its buffoonery contains some sound and acute criticism.* The peculiarity of it, however, consists in its attacking Wieland for treating heroes unheroically, at a time when, from various parts of Germany, loud voices were raised against Wieland, as an immoral, an unchristian, nay, even an atheistical writer. Lavater called upon Christians to pray for this sinner; theologians forbade their followers to read his works; 'pulpits were loud against him. In 1773 the whole Klopstock school rose against him* in moral indignation, and burned his works on Klopstock's birthday. Very different was Goethe's ire. He read nothing of this in Wieland, but he saw that the gods and heroes were represented in perruques and satin breeches, that their cheeks were rouged, their thews and sinews shrunk to those of a petit maitre; and against such a conception of the old Pagan life he raised his voice.

* It called forth a retort, Thieren, Menschen, und Goethe; which has not fallen in my way. Critics speak of it as personal but worthless.

'I cannot blame you,' he writes to Kestner, 'for living in the world and making acquaintances among men of rank and influence. Intercourse with the great is always advantageous to him who knows properly how to use it. I honor gunpowder, if only for its power of bringing me a bird down out of the air . . . . So in God's name continue, and don't trouble yourself about the opinion of others, shut your heart to antagonists as to flatterers . . . . O Kestner, I am in excellent spirits, and if I have not you by my side, yet all the dear ones are ever before me. The circle of noble natures is the highest happiness I have yet achieved. And now, my dear Götz! I trust in his strong nature, he will endure. He is a human offspring with many sins, and nevertheless one of the best. Many will object to his clothing and rough angles; yet I have so much applause that it astonishes me. I don't think I shall soon write anything which will again find its public. Meanwhile I work on, in the hope that something striking in the whirl of things may be laid hold of.'

* Gervinus, iv. 285.

As yet, therefore, we see that Werther was not in contemplation. On Christmas day 1773, in answer to Kestner's wish that he should come to Hanover and play a part there, he writes this noticeable sentence. 'My father would not object to my entering foreign service, and no hope or desire of an office detains me here — but, dear Kestner, the talents and powers which I have, I need too much for my own aims; I am accustomed to act according to my instinct, and therewith can no prince be served.' In less than two years he was to accept service under a prince; but we shall see that he did so with full consciousness of what was required, and of what he could afford to give.

The mention of that prince leads me to make an important correction in the date of the first acquaintance with him, erroneously placed in the December of 1774 by Goethe and by all subsequent writers, until Stahr* noticed in the correspondence with Knebel the real date of February 1774. It is useless to inquire how Goethe's memory could so have deceived him as to bring this important event in conjunction with his first acquaintance with Lili; the dates of the Knebel correspondence are beyond question. On the 11th of February Knebel paid him a visit, and informed him that the two princes, Karl August and Constantine, were desirous of seeing him. He went, and was received with flattering kindness, especially by Karl August, who had just read Götz. He dined with his royal hosts in a quiet way, and then left them, having received and produced an agreeable impression. They were going to Mainz whither he promised to follow them. His father, like a sturdy old burgher, who held aloof from princes, shook his sceptical head at the idea of this visit. To Mainz, however, the poet went, a day or two afterwards, and spent several days with the young princes, as their guest. This was his first contact with men of high rank.

* Weimar und Jena, ii. p. 211.

In the following May he hears with joy that Lotte is a mother, and that her boy is to be called Wolfgang, after him ; and on the 16th of June he writes to Lotte : ‘ I will soon send you a friend who has much resemblance to me, and hope you will receive him well ; he is named Werther, and is and was — but that he must himself explain.’

Whoever has followed the history thus far, moving on the secure ground of contemporary document, will see how vague and inaccurate is the account of the composition of Werther given by its author, in his retrospective glance at the period. It was not originated by the news of Jerusalem’s death. It was not originated by growing despair at the loss of Charlotte. It was not originated by tormenting thoughts of self-destruction. It was not to free himself from suicide that he wrote this story of suicide. All these several threads were woven into its woof ; but the rigor of dates forces us to the conviction that Werther, although taken from his experience, was not written while that experience was being lived. Indeed, the true philosophy of art would, à priori, lead us to the conviction that, although he cleared his ‘ bosom of the perilous stuff ’ by moulding this perilous stuff into a work of art, he must have essentially outlived the storm before he painted it, — conquered his passion, and subdued the rebellious thoughts, before he could make them plastic to his purpose. The poet cannot see to write when his eyes are full of tears ; cannot sing when his breast is swollen with sighs, and sobs choke utterance. He must rise superior to his grief before he can sublimate his grief in song. The artist is a master, not a slave ; he wields his passion, he is not hurried along by it; he possesses, and is not possessed. Art enshrines the great sadness of the world, but is itself not sad. The storm of passion weeps itself away, and the heavy clouds roll off in quiet masses, to make room for the sun, which, shining through, touches them to beauty with its rays. While pain is in its newness it is pain, and nothing else; it is not Art, but Feeling. Goethe could not write Werther before he had outlived Wertherism. It may have been, as he says, a 'general confession,' and a confession which brought him certain relief; but we do not confess until we have repented, and we do not repent until we have outlived the error.

Werther was written rapidly. 'I completely isolated myself,' he says; 'nay, prohibited the visits of my friends, and put aside everything that did not immediately belong to the subject. Under such circumstances, and under so many preparations in secret, I wrote it in four weeks, without any scheme of the whole, or treatment of any part being previously put on paper.' It is of this seclusion Merck writes: 'Le grand succès que son drame a eu lui tourne un peu la tête. Il se détache de tous ses amis, et n'existe que dans les compositions qu'il prépare pour le public.'

In September 1774 he wrote to Lotte, sending her a copy of Werther: 'Lotte, how dear this little book is to me thou wilt feel in reading it, and this copy is as dear to me as if it were the only one in the world. Thou must have it, Lotte; I have kissed it a hundred times; have kept it locked up that no one might touch it. O, Lotte! And I beg thee let no one except Meyers see it yet; it will be published at the Leipsic fair. I wish each to read it alone, thou alone, — Kestner alone, — and each to write me a little word about it. Lotte, adieu, Lotte!'

Let us now take a glance at this work, which startled Europe, and which for a long while was all that Europe knew of Goethe.*

† Scott in prefacing his translation of Götz, says: “It was written by the elegant author of the Sorrows of Werther.”

CHAPTER V.

WERTHER.

Aujourd'hui l'homme désire immensément, mais il veut faiblement. In these words Guizot has written an epigraph for Werther, a book composed out of a double history, the history of its author's experience, and the history of one of his friends.

The story of Jerusalem, whom we saw in the Wetzlar circle, furnished Goethe with the machinery by which to introduce his own experience. He took many of the details from Kestner's long letter, sent shortly after the catastrophe: the letter may therefore be here abridged, as an introduction to the novel. Jerusalem, melancholy by temperament, was unhappy during the whole of his Wetzlar residence. - He had been denied admittance into the high diplomatic society to which his position gave him claims; he had been in unpleasant relations with his ambassador, whose secretary he was; and he had fallen in love with the wife of his friend. Thus oppressed, he shunned company, was fond of long moonlight walks, and once lost himself in the wood, wandering about the whole night. But he was solitary, even in his grief, told none of his friends the causes of his melancholy, and solaced himself with novels — the wretched novels of that day. To these he added all the tragedies he could get hold of;

English writers, especially the gloomy writers; and various philosophical works. He wrote also essays, one on suicide, a subject which greatly occupied him. Mendelssohn's Phædon was his favorite work.* When the rumor reached Wetzlar of Goué's suicide, he said that Goué was not a fit man for such a deed, but defended the act as an act. A few days before his own unhappy end he was talking with Schleimitz about suicide, and said, 'It must be a bad look out, however, if the shot were not to take effect!' The rest of the narrative must be told in Kestner's own words, the simple circumstantial style best fitting such a history.

'Last Tuesday he comes with a discontented look to Kielmansegge, who was ill. The latter asks him how he is? "Better than I like to be." He also that day talked a good deal about love, which he had never done before; and then about the Frankfurter Zeitung, which had for some time pleased him more than usual. In the afternoon (Tuesday) he goes to Secretary H.'s. Until eight o'clock in the evening they play tarock together. Annchen Brandt was also there; Jerusalem accompanied her home. As they walk, Jerusalem often strikes his forehead, gloomily and repeatedly says: "If one were but dead, — if one were but in heaven!" Annchen joked him about it; he bargains for a place by her side in heaven, and at parting he says: "It is agreed, then, that I shall have a place by you in heaven."

'On Wednesday, as there were great doings at the Crown Prince, and everybody invited everybody, he went there to dinner, though he generally dined at home, and he brought Secretary H. with him. He did not behave * Goethe it will be remembered, made in Strasburg an analysis of this work, contrasting it with Plato's.

there otherwise than usual; if anything, he was more cheerful. After dinner Secretary H. takes him home with him to see his wife. They take coffee; Jerusalem says to Mrs. H.: "Dear Mrs. H., this is the last coffee I shall drink with you." She thinks it a joke, and answers in that tone. The same afternoon (Wednesday) Jerusalem was alone at H.'s: what took place there is unknown; perhaps herein lies the cause of what followed. In the evening, just as it was dark, Jerusalem comes to Garbenheim, into the usual inn, asks whether any one is in the room above? On the answer, No, he goes up, soon comes down again, goes out into the yard, towards the left, comes back after a little while, goes into the garden; it becomes quite dark, he remains there a long time, the hostess makes her remarks upon this, he comes out of the garden, goes past her with hasty steps, all without saying a word, into the yard, hurrying straight away from it.

'In the meantime, or still later, something passed between H. and his wife, concerning which, H. confides to a female friend that they quarrelled a little about Jerusalem; and his wife at last desired that he would forbid him the house, whereupon he did so the following day, in a note.

'[It is said * that Secretary H. has given secret information that on the Wednesday before Jerusalem's death, when he was with H. and his wife taking coffee, the husband was obliged to go to the ambassador. When he returns, he observes an extraordinary seriousness in his wife, and a silence in Jerusalem, which appear strange to him, especially as he finds them so much changed after his return. Jerusalem goes away. Secretary H. makes his observations on the above-mentioned circumstances:

* The passage in brackets occurs in a subsequent letter; it is inserted here to give the story continuity.

he contracts suspicion that something injurious to him may have happened in his absence ; for he is very suspicious and jealous. Nevertheless, he puts on a composed and cheerful air, and determines to put his wife to the test. He says : Jerusalem has often invited him to dinner ; what does she think of their asking Jerusalem for once to dine with them ? She, the wife, answers : No ; and she must entirely break off intercourse with Jerusalem ; he begins to behave in such a way that she must altogether avoid his society. And she held herself bound to tell him, her husband, what had passed in his absence. Jerusalem had thrown himself at her feet, and had wanted to make a formal declaration of love to her. She was naturally indignant at this, and had uttered many reproaches to him, etc. She now desired that her husband would forbid him, Jerusalem, the house, for she could and would neither see nor hear anything more of him.

‘ Hereupon, it is said, H. the next morning wrote the note to Jerusalem, etc.]

‘ In the night of Wednesday-Thursday he got up at two o’clock, awakened the servant, said he could not sleep, he was not well, has a fire lighted, tea made, yet is afterwards, to all appearance, very well.

‘ Thursday morning, Secretary H. sends Jerusalem a note. The maid will not wait for an answer, and goes away. Jerusalem has just been shaved. At eleven o’clock Jerusalem sends a note to Secretary H., who does not take it from the servant, and says he requires no answer, he cannot enter into any correspondence, and besides they saw each other every day at the office. When the servant brings back the note unopened, Jerusalem throws it on the table and says : Very good. (Perhaps to make the servant believe that it related to some indifferent matter.)

‘ In the middle of the day he dines at home, but takes little — some soup. At one o’clock he sends a note to me, and at the same time one to his ambassador, in which he begs the latter to send him his money for this (or the following) month. The servant comes to me. I am not at home, nor is my servant. Jerusalem in the meantime is gone out, comes home about a quarter past three, the servant gives him the note again. Jerusalem asks him why he did not leave it at my house with some maid-servant? He replies, because it was open and unsealed. Jerusalem: That was of no consequence, every one might read it; he must take it again. The servant thinks himself hereby warranted to read it also, reads it, and then sends it by a boy who waits in the house. I, in the meantime, had come home; it might be half-past three when I received the following note: “ Might I beg of you to lend me your pistols for a journey which I am about to take? — J.”* As I knew nothing of all this that I have told you, or of his principles, having never had any particular intercourse with him, I had not the least hesitation in sending him the pistols.

‘ The servant had read in the note that his master intended to make a journey, and indeed the latter had himself told him so, also had ordered everything for his journey the next morning at six o’clock, even the friseur, without his (the servant’s) knowing whither, or with whom, or in what way. But as Jerusalem always kept his engagements secret from him, this did not arouse his suspicion. Nevertheless he thought to himself: “ Is master perhaps going secretly to Brunswick, leaving me here alone ? ” &c. He had to take the pistols to a gunmaker’s to get them loaded.

† ‘ Dürfte ich Ew. Wohlgeb. wohl zu einer vorhabenden Reise um ihre Pistolen gehorsamst ersuchen? ’ The German epistolary forms of civility are not translatable.

‘ The whole afternoon Jerusalem was busy alone ; rummaged among his papers, wrote, walked, as the people below in the house heard, rapidly up and down the room. He also went out several times, and paid his small debts ; he had taken a pair of ruffles, he said to the servant ; they did not satisfy him, he must return them to the tradesman ; if he did not like to take them again, there was the money for them, which in fact the tradesman preferred.

‘ About seven o’clock the Italian master came to him. He found him restless and out of humor. He complained that he had his hypochondriasis again strongly, and about various things ; said also, that the best he could do would be to take himself out of the world. The Italian urged upon him very seriously that such passions must be repressed by philosophy, &c. Jerusalem : That is not so easily done ; he would rather be alone to-day, he might leave him, &c. The Italian : He must go into society, amuse himself, &c. Jerusalem : Well, he was going out again. The Italian, seeing the pistols on the table, is anxious about the result, goes away at eight o’clock and to Kielmansegge, to whom he talks of nothing but Jerusalem, his restlessness and discontent, without however mentioning his anxiety, because he believed that he might be laughed at for it.

‘ The servant went to Jerusalem to take off his boots. But he said, he was going out again ; as he really did, before the Silberthor on the Starke Weide and elsewhere in the streets, where, with his hat pressed over his eyes, he rushed by several persons, with rapid steps, without seeing any one. He was also seen about this time standing a long time by the river, in a position as if he meant to throw himself in (so they say).

‘ Before nine o’clock he comes home, says to the servant that there must be more fuel put in the stove, because he shall not go to bed yet, also tells him to get everything ready for six o’clock in the morning, and has a pint of wine brought to him. The servant, that he may be ready very early, because his master was always very punctual, goes to bed in his clothes.

‘ As soon as Jerusalem was alone, he seems to have prepared everything for the dreadful deed. He tore up his correspondence and threw it under the table, as I have myself seen. He wrote two letters, one to his relations, the other to H. ; it is thought also that he wrote one to the ambassador Höfler, which the latter perhaps suppresses. They lay on the writing table. The first, which the medical man saw the next morning, contained in substance only what follows, as Dr. Held, who read it, related to me :

‘ “ Dear father, dear mother, dear sisters and brother-in-law, forgive your unhappy son and brother ; God, God bless you ! ”

‘ In the second, he entreated H. for forgiveness that he had disturbed the peace and happiness of his married life, and created dissension between this dear couple, etc. At first his inclination for H.’s wife had been only virtuous, etc. It is said to have been three sheets long, and to have ended thus : — “ One o’clock. In the other life we shall see each other again.” (In all probability he shot himself immediately on finishing this letter.)’

The sensation produced in Wetzlar by this suicide was immense. People who had scarcely seen him once were unable to quiet themselves about it ; many could not sleep ; the women especially felt the deepest interest in the fate of this unhappy youth ; and Werther found a public ready for it.

With these materials in hand, let us take up the novel to see how Goethe employs them. Werther is a man who, not having yet learned self-mastery, imagines that his immense desires are proofs of immense superiority; one of those of whom it has been wittily said that they fancy themselves great painters because they paint with a big brush. He laughs at all rules, whether they be rules of Art, or rules which Convention builds like walls around our daily life. He hates order — in speech, in writing, in costume, in office. In a word, he hates all control. Gervinus remarks that he turns from men to children because they do not pain him, and from them to Nature because she does not contradict him; from truth to poetry and in poetry from the clear world of Homer to the formless world of Ossian. Very characteristic of the epoch is the boundless enthusiasm inspired by Ossian, whose rhetorical trash the Germans hailed as the finest expression of Nature's poetry. Old Samuel Johnson's stern, clear sense saw into the very heart of this subject when he said, 'Sir, a man might write such stuff forever if he would but abandon his mind to it.' It is this abandonment of the mind, this throwing the reins on the horse's neck, which makes such writing possible; and it was precisely this abandonment to impulse, this disregard of the grave remonstrances of reason and good sense, which distinguished the Werther epoch.

Werther is not Goethe. Werther perishes because he is wretched, and is so wretched because he is so weak. Goethe was 'king over himself.' He saw the danger and evaded it; tore himself away from the woman he loved, instead of continuing in a dangerous position. Yet although Werther is not Goethe, there is one part of Goethe living in Werther. This is visible in the incidents and language as well as in the character. It is the part we see re-appearing under the various masks of Weislingen, Clavigo, Faust, Fernando, Edward, Meister and Tasso, which no critic will call the same lay figure variously draped, but which every critic must see belong to one and the same genus: men of strong desires and weak volitions, wavering impressionable natures unable to attain self-mastery. Goethe was one of those who are wavering because impressionable, but whose wavering is not weakness; they oscillate, but they return into the direct path which their wills have prescribed. He was tender as well as impressionable. He could not be stern, but he could be resolute. He had only therefore to keep in abeyance the native force of resolution which gave him mastery, and in that abeyance a weak wavering character stood before him, the original of which was himself.

When a man delineates himself, he always shrinks from a complete confession. Our moral nature has its modesty. Strong as the impulse may be to drag into light that which lies hidden in the recesses of the soul, pleased as we may be to create images of ourselves, we involuntarily keep back something, and refuse to identify ourselves with the creation. There are few things more irritating than the pretension of another to completely understand us. Hence authors never thoroughly portray themselves. Byron, utterly without self-command, is fond of heroes proud and self-sustaining. Goethe, the strongest of men, makes heroes the footballs of circumstance. But he also draws from his other half the calm, self-sustaining characters. Thus we have the antithesis of Götz and Weislingen — Albert and Werther — Carlos and Clavigo — Jarno and Meister — Antonio and Tasso — the Captain and Edward; and, deepened in coloring, Mephistopheles and Faust.

Werther is not much read now-a-days, especially in England, where it labors under the double disadvantage of a bad name and an execrable translation. Yet it is well worth reading in the original, where it will be found very unlike the image of it current among us. I remember many years ago reading it in the execrable English version with astonishment and contempt; this contempt remained, until accidentally falling in with a Spanish translation, the exquisite beauty of the pictures changed my feeling into admiration, and Goethe's own wonderful prose afterwards fixed that admiration forever. It is a masterpiece of style; we may look through German literature in vain for such clear sunny pictures, fulness of life, and delicately managed simplicity. Its style is one continuous strain of music, which, restrained within the limits of prose, fulfils all the conditions of poetry; dulcet as the sound of falling waters, and as full of sweet melancholy as an autumnal eve.

Nothing can be simpler than the structure of this book, wherein, as M. Marmier well remarks,* every detail is so arranged as to lay bare the sufferings of a diseased spirit. Werther arrives at his chosen retreat, believing himself cured, and anticipating perfect happiness. He is painter and poet. The fresh spring mornings, the sweet cool evenings, soothe and strengthen him. He selects a place under the limes to read and dream away the hours. There he brings his pencil and his Homer. Everything interests him—the old woman who brings his coffee, the children who play around him, the story of a poor family. In this serene convalescence he meets with Charlotte, and a new passion agitates his soul. His simple uniform existence becomes changed. He endeavors by bodily activity to charm away his desires. The days no longer resemble each other: now ecstatic with hope, now crushed with despair. Winter comes: cold, sad, gloomy. He must away. He departs, and mingles with the world, but the world disgusts him. The monotony and emptiness of official life are intolerable to his pretensions; the parchment pride of the noblesse is insulting to his sense of superiority. He returns to the peaceful scene of his former contentment, and finds indeed Charlotte, the children, his favorite woods and walks, but not the calmness which he seeks. The hopelessness of his position overwhelms him. Disgusted with the world — unsatisfied in his cravings — he dies by his own hand.

* Etudes sur Goethe, p. 11.

Rosenkrantz — in the true spirit of that criticism which seeks everywhere for meanings more recondite than the author dreamt of — thinks that Goethe exhibits great art in making Werther a diplomatist, because a diplomatist is a man of shams (scheinthuer); but the truth is, Goethe made him precisely what he found him. His art is truth. He is so great an artist that the simplest realities have to him significance. Charlotte cutting bread and butter for the children — the scene of the ball — the children clinging round Werther for sugar, and pictures of that kind, betray so little inventive power, that they have excited the ridicule of some English critics to whom poetry is a thing of pomp and classicality, not the beautiful vesture of reality. The beauty and art of Werther is not in the incidents (a Dumas would shrug despairing shoulders over such invention), but in the representation.* What is Art but Representation? *

* ‘L’art n’est qu’une forme,’ says George Sand, with a truth few critics have penetrated; let me add Goethe’s own opinion — surely of weight in such matters: ‘None will comprehend the simple truth that the highest, the only operation of art is representation.’ — (Gestaltung.)

The effect of Werther was prodigious. ‘That nameless unrest,’ says Carlyle, ‘the blind struggle of a soul in bondage, that high, sad, longing discontent which was agitating every bosom, had driven Goethe almost to despair. All felt it; he alone could give it voice. And here lies the secret of his popularity; in his deep, susceptible heart he felt a thousand times more keenly what every one was feeling; with the creative gift which belonged to him as a poet, he bodied it forth into visible shape, gave it a local habitation and a name; and so made himself the spokesman of his generation. Werther is but the cry of that dim, rooted pain under which all thoughtful men of a certain age were languishing: it paints the misery, it passionately utters the complaint; and heart and voice all over Europe loudly and at once respond to it. True it prescribes no remedy; for that was a far different, far harder enterprise, to which other years and a higher culture were required; but even this utterance of pain, even this little, for the present is grasped at, and with eager sympathy appropriated in every bosom. If Byron’s life-weariness, his moody melancholy, and mad, stormful indignation, borne on the tones of a wild and quite artless melody, could pierce so deep into many a British heart, now that the whole matter is no longer new—is indeed old and trite—we may judge with what vehement acceptance this Werther must have been welcomed, coming, as it did, like a voice from the unknown regions: the first thrilling peal of that impassioned dirge which, in country after country, men’s ears have listened to till they were deaf to all else. For Werther infusing itself into the core and whole spirit of literature, gave birth to a race of sentimentalists who have raged and wailed in every part of the world, till the better light dawned on them, or, at worst, exhausted nature laid herself to sleep, and it was discovered that lamenting was unproductive labor. These funereal choristers, in Germany a loud, haggard, tumultuous, as well as tearful class, were named the Kraftmänner, or Powermen; but have long since, like sick children, cried themselves to rest.*

Perhaps there never was a fiction which so startled and enraptured the world. Men of all kinds and classes were moved by it. It was the companion of Napoleon, when in Egypt; it penetrated into China. To convey in a sentence its wondrous popularity, we may state that in Germany it became a people's book, hawked about the streets, printed on miserable paper, like an ancient ballad; and in the Chinese empire, Charlotte and Werther were modelled in porcelain.†

* Miscellanies, vol. i. p. 272.

† While in Italy, he received a letter from a young Frenchman, who said: ‘Oui, Monsieur, je vous dois la meilleure action de ma vie, par conséquent, la racine de plusieurs autres, et pour moi votre livre est bon. Si j'avais le bonheur d'habiter le même pays que vous, j'irais vous embrasser, et vous dire mon secret; mais malheureusement j'en habite un où personne ne croirait au motif qui vient de me déterminer à cette démarche. Soyez satisfait, Monsieur, d'avoir pu à trois cents lieues de votre demeure ramener le cœur d'un jeune homme à l'honnêteté et à la vertu, toute une famille va être tranquille, et mon cœur jouit d'une bonne action.’

Let me not forget the visit of his English admirer, who accosted him on the stairs with ‘You must be the author of Werther!’ adding that he could not wait a moment longer, all he wanted to say was this, ‘I will not repeat what you must have heard from thousands, for indeed your work has not affected me so much as it has others; but when I think what it required to write such a book, I am lost in astonishment.’ Having eased his mind of this weight, he wished Goethe a hearty farewell, and ran down stairs.

A similar story is told by Schiller in a letter to Körner. “A shrivelled figure entered my room, and asked me if I was not Councillor Schiller. I replied in the affirmative. ‘I heard that you were Objectors of course there were. Lessing, for example, who neither suffered from the disease of the epoch, nor tolerated any approach to sentimentality, thought so fiery a production ought to have a cold epilogue to counteract it. 'Do you believe,' he wrote, 'that any Roman or Grecian youth would thus and therefore have committed suicide? Certainly not. They knew how to guard themselves from the extravagancies of love, and in the days of Socrates such an ἕξ ἔρωτος κατοχή, whom τι τολμᾶν παρὰ φύσιν impelled, would scarcely be pardoned even by a girl. Such little-great questionable originals only suit our Christian culture, which knows so well how to transform a corporeal necessity into a spiritual perfection. So, worthy Goethe, let us have a concluding chapter; and the more cynical the better.'* This is a misstatement of the whole question. It is not the extravagance of love which causes Werther's suicide: it is his own diseased moral nature which makes life insupportable, and which makes unhappy here, and could not restrain myself from seeing the author of Don Carlos.' 'Gehorsamer Diener! your most obedient servant,' said I; 'whom have I the honor of addressing?' 'I have not the happiness of being known to you. My name is Vulpius.' 'I am indebted to you for your politeness; unluckily, I have an engagement.' 'Oh, sir, I beg you won't mention it. I am quite satisfied with having seen you.' — Briefwechsel, i. p. 105.

At the risk of swelling this note to unreasonable dimensions, I must quote a passage from Pliny's Letters, which records a similar anecdote: 'Nunquamne legisti Gaditanum quemdam Titi Livii nomine gloriaque commotum ad visendum eum ab ultimo terrarum orbe venisse, statimque ut viderat abiisse?' — Lib. ii. Ep. iii.

* Lessing: Werke, x. 225, Letter to Eschenberg.

It is surmised that Lessing's objections to Werther were sharpened by his dislike at recognizing his young friend, Jerusalem, thus brought into a fiction. A letter from Weisse to Garve, quoted by Appell (Werther und seine Zeit, p. 50), confirms this.

love the spark that fires the train. Moreover, one reads with surprise this reference to Greek and Roman life, coming from so admirable a scholar as Lessing. He forgot that Sophocles, in the Antigone, makes an unhappy lover commit suicide because his mistress is lost to him. He forgot, also, that the Stoics introduced the 'fashion' of suicide into Rome; and in Alexandria the Epicureans established a 'society for the suppression of life' — the συναποθαρουνμενοι — where, having exhausted every pleasure, the members assembled at the feast, the wine-cup went freely round, and in the midst of this orgie they quietly put an end to their contemptible existences: — a new variation of the 'conversazione,' at which, instead of music and æsthetic tea, the guests were invited to supper and suicide.

The Berlin Aristarchus — Nicolai — an upright, but narrow-minded man, and a great enemy of all Schwärmerei, wrote by way of criticism a parody called the Joys of Young Werther, in which sentimentalism is ridiculed: — Werther shoots himself with chicken's blood only, and marries Charlotte 'and lives happy all the rest of his life.'

Goethe's answer to this was 'a burlesque poem called Nicolai at Werther's grave, which, however, cannot be communicated.' This poem has been recovered and printed by Boas.* It is exceedingly coarse, and not very humorous. The admirers of Werther, of course, are greatly incensed against Nicolai; but they forget that Nicolai never denied the talent of the work, he only followed Lessing's objection to its tendency. His criticism, moreover, was but a feather in the scale against the praise which poured in from all sides. Two specimens of this enthusiasm may here be given. The first is from Zimmermann, the author of the well-known work on Solitude, who thus breaks out in one of his letters : — ‘Werther’s Leidun ! vous ne me supposez pas capable d’avoir tardé une minute à dévorer ce roman si vrai, si naturel, si ressemblant à tout ce qu’on a senti mille et mille fois en sa vie, et cependant la lecture du premier tome m’a donné tant d’émotion, a remué et fait frémir tellement toutes les cordes de mon âme qu’il m’a fallu reposer quinze jours avant que j’ai eu le courage d’en venir au second, dont la lecture a été pareillement l’affaire d’un instant.’ *

* Nachträge zu Goethe's Werke : Lief. i. p. 12.

Kotzebue’s enthusiasm is not less. ‘I cannot find words to express,’ he says in his Memoirs, ‘the overpowering emotions excited in my soul by this wonderful philosophical romance. From that moment I conceived so enthusiastic an attachment to its author, that at his request I would willingly have thrust my hand into the fire to rescue his shoe buckle.’ †

But while the public was reading the tragic story of Werther through fast flowing tears, a painful sense of indignation rose in the breasts of Kestner and Charlotte at seeing themselves thus dragged into publicity, their story falsified. The narrative was in many respects too close to reality not to be very offensive in its deviations from reality. The figures were unmistakeable ; and yet they were not the real figures. The eager public soon found out who were the principal personages, and that a real history was at the bottom of the romance ; but as the whole truth could not be known, the Kestners found themselves in a very false light. They were hurt by this indiscretion of their friend ; more hurt perhaps than they chose to confess ; and we may read, in the following fragment of the sketch of the letter sent by Kestner on receipt of the book, the accents of an offended friend whose pride restrains the full expression of his anger :

* Briefe von Göthe und dessen Mutter an F. v. Stein, p. 180.

† In the Appendix to this volume (Appendix D), will be found a curious list of works called forth by the publication of Werther, and testifying to the effect it produced. It may interest the reader to know, that the first of the many translations which appeared was by Gibbon’s friend, George Deyverdun : Werther, traduit de l’Allemand ; 1776.

‘ Your Werther might have given me great pleasure, since it could have reminded me of many interesting scenes and incidents. But as it is, it has in certain respects given me little edification. You know I like to speak my mind.

‘ It is true, you have woven something new into each person, or have fused several persons into one. So far good. But if in this interweaving and fusing you had taken counsel of your heart, you would not have so prostituted the real persons whose features you borrow. You wished to draw from nature, that your picture might be truthful ; and yet you have combined so much that is contradictory, that you have missed the very mark at which you aimed. The distinguished author will revolt against this judgment, but I appeal to reality and truth itself when I pronounce that the artist has failed. The real Lotte would, in many instances, be grieved if she were like the Lotte you have there painted. I know well that it is said to be a character compounded of two, but the Mrs. H. whom you have partly inwoven was also incapable of what you attribute to your heroine. But this expenditure of fiction was not at all necessary to your end, to nature and truth, for it was without any such behavior on the part of a woman — a behavior which must ever be dishonorable even to a more than ordinary woman — that Jerusalem shot himself.

‘The real Lotte, whose friend you nevertheless wish to be, is in your picture, which contains too much of her not to suggest her strongly, is, I say — but no, I will not say it, it pains me already too much only to think it. And Lotte’s husband — you called him your friend, and God knows that he was so — is with her.

‘The miserable creature of an Albert! In spite of its being an alleged fancy picture and not a portrait, it also has such traits of an original (only external traits, it is true, thank God, only external), that it is easy to guess the real person. And if you wanted to have him act so, need you have made him such a blockhead? that forthwith you might step forward and say, see what a fine fellow I am!’

Kestner here touches on a point of morality in literature worth consideration. While emphatically declaring that the artist must take his materials from reality, must employ his own experience, and draw the characters he has really known, we must as emphatically declare that he is bound to represent his experience in forms sufficiently different from the reality to prevent the public reading actual histories beneath his invention, and recognizing the persons he has employed as lay figures, whenever those persons are assigned parts which they would reject. There is, of course, great difficulty in keeping to truth while avoiding the betrayal of actual occurrences; but it is a difficulty which is commanded by morality.

Goethe was evidently astounded at the effect his book had produced on his friends: ‘I must at once write to you, my dear and angry friends, and free my heart. The thing is done; the book is out; forgive me if you can. I will hear nothing till the event has proved how exaggerated your anxiety is, and till you have more truly felt, in the book itself, the innocent mingling of fiction and truth. Thou hast, dear Kestner, exhausted everything, cut away all the ground of my excuse, and left me nothing to say ; yet I know not, my heart has still more to say, although I cannot express it. I am silent, but the sweet presentiment I must still retain, and I hope eternal Fate has that in store for me which will bind us yet closer one to the other. Yes, dear ones, I who am so bound to you by love, must still remain debtor to you and your children for the uncomfortable hours which my — name it as you will — has given you . . . . And now, my dear ones, when anger rises within you, think, oh think only that your old Goethe, ever and ever, and now more than ever, is your own.'

Their anger fell. They saw that he had committed an indiscretion, but had done no more. They wrote forgiveness, as we gather from this letter Goethe sent on the 21st of November :

' Here I have thy letter, Kestner ! On a strange desk, in a painter's studio, for yesterday I began to paint in oil, I have thy letter, and must give thee my thanks ! Thanks, dear friend ! Thou art ever the same good soul ! O that I could spring on thy neck, throw myself at Lotte's feet, one, one minute, and all, all that should be done away with, explained, which I could not make clear with quires of paper ! O ye unbelieving ones, I could exclaim ! Ye of little faith ! Could you feel the thousandth part of what Werther is to a thousand hearts, you would not reckon the sacrifice you have made towards it ! Here is a letter, read it, and send me word quickly what thou thinkest of it, what impression it makes on thee. Thou sendest me Hennings' letter ; he does not condemn me ; he excuses me. Dear brother Kestner ! if you will wait, you shall be contented.

I would not, to save my own life, call back Werther, and believe me, believe in me, thy anxieties, thy gravamina will vanish like phantoms of the night if thou hast patience ; and then, between this and a year, I promise you in the most affectionate, peculiar, fervent manner, to disperse, as if it were a mere north-wind fog and mist, whatever may remain of suspicion, misinterpretation, etc., in the gossiping public, though it is a herd of swine. Werther must — must be ! You do not feel him, you only feel me and yourselves ; and that which you call stuck on, and in spite of you, and others, is interwoven. If I live, it is thee I have to thank for it ; thus thou art not Albert. And thus —

‘ Give Lotte a warm greeting for me, and say to her : “ To know that your name is uttered by a thousand hallowed lips with reverence, is surely an equivalent for anxieties which would scarcely, apart from anything else, vex a person long in common life, where one is at the mercy of every tattler.” ’

‘ If you are generous and do not worry me, I will send you letters, cries, sighs after Werther, and if you have faith, believe that all will be well, and gossip is nothing, and weigh well your philosopher’s letter, which I have kissed.

‘ O then ! — hast not felt how the man embraces thee, consoles thee, and in thy — in Lotte’s worth, finds consolation enough under the wretchedness which has terrified you even in the fiction. Lotte, farewell, — Kestner, love me, and do not worry me.’

The pride of the author in his darling breaks out in this letter, now his friends have forgiven him. We must admit that Kestner had reason to be annoyed ; the more so as his friends, identifying him with the story, wrote sympathetically about it. He had to reply to Hennings on the subject, and in telling him the true story, begged him to correct the false reports. He says : ‘In the first part of Werther, Werther is Goethe himself. In Lotte and Albert he has borrowed traits from us, my wife and myself. Many of the scenes are quite true, and yet partly altered ; others are, at least in our history, unreal. For the sake of the second part, and in order to prepare for the death of Werther, he has introduced various things into the first part which do not at all belong to us. For example, Lotte has never either with Goethe or with any one else stood in the intimate relation which is there described ; in this we have certainly great reason to be offended with him, for several accessory circumstances are too true and too well known for people not to point to us. He regrets it now, but of what use is that to us ? It is true he has a great regard for my wife ; but he ought to have depicted her more faithfully in this point, that she was too wise and delicate ever to let him go so far as is represented in the first part. She behaved to him in such a way as to make her far dearer to me than before, if this had been possible. Moreover, our engagement was never made public, though not, it is true, kept a secret ; still she was too bashful ever to confess it to any one. And there was no engagement between us but that of hearts. It was not till shortly before my departure (when Goethe had already been a year away from Wetzlar at Frankfurt, and the disguised Werther had been dead half a year) that we were married. After the lapse of a year, since our residence here, we have become father and mother. The dear boy lives still, and gives us, thank God, much joy. For the rest, there is in Werther much of Goethe’s character and manner of thinking. Lotte’s portrait is completely that of my wife. Albert might have been made a little more ardent. The second part of Werther has nothing whatever to do with us . . . When Goethe had printed his book, he sent us an early copy, and thought we should fall into raptures with what he had done. But we at once saw what would be the effect, and your letter confirms our fears. I wrote very angrily to him. He then, for the first time saw what he had done ; but the book was printed, and he hoped our fears were idle.' In another letter to the same, Kestner says: ' You have no idea what a man he is. But when his great fire has somewhat burnt itself out, then we shall all have the greatest joy in him.'

We have thus brought to a close the history of Werther, its composition and effect ; a history so important in the biography of its author, that we might have been excused for having devoted so much space to it, even if the letters, which have furnished the evidence, did not throw so strong a light upon a period very inadequately represented in the Wahrheit und Dichtung.

On the 28th August, 1849, the hundredth anniversary of the great poet's birth, when all Germany joined in a jubilee, a small marble monument was erected in the well known Wertherplatz without the Wetzlar gates, where Goethe was wont to sit and muse ; three lime trees are planted round it, bearing this inscription :

RUEPLATZ DES DICHTERS

GOETHE

ZU SEINEM ANDENKEN FRISCH-BEPFLANZT

BEI DER JUBELFEIER AM 28 AUG. 1849.

CHAPTER VI.

SURVEY OF GERMAN LITERATURE.

THERE never was a solitary Great Man. We may single one man from out the crowd, and place him on a pedestal ; but, if we look attentively, we shall perceive others surrounding him also deserving pedestals, though none perhaps so eminent as he. Shakespeare, who lets few things escape his glance, has noted this in Julius Cæsar :

‘ When went there by an age, since the great flood,
But it was famed with more than with one man ? ’

The reason is, that whenever the confluence of circumstances calls for great energies, the energies are ready to the call. Men are equal to their destiny, and, as Schiller finely says, ‘ grow with the circle wherein they move.’

‘ Es wächst der Mensch mit seinem grosserem Kreise.’

Eminent as Goethe stood above his contemporaries, he did not stand alone ; around him, on his first splendid entrance into the arena, were men who had already fixed the fluctuating reverence of the public — Lessing, Herder, Klopstock, Wieland, and many lesser names. These, and their works, I might presuppose the reader to be more or less familiar with ; and, consulting my own ease rather than his profit, might pass on with the briefest indication.

But, in truth, it is a great mistake to presuppose such knowledge ; only a few readers will possess it ; the majority would by no means be grateful for a compliment which left them in darkness, and it is for the sake of these that the present chapter is written. It is a chapter, not a volume, and must therefore only touch upon leading traits. For readers who desire more detail, there is no lack of voluminous works.

Germany is a large and heterogeneous country. It is washed by the waves of the Baltic, German and Adriatic Seas ; it lies between the woods of Poland and the marshes of Holland, between the Alpine ranges and the Danish plains ; it shakes hands with Scandinavia, with Italy, and with France, and thus presents an area of many peoples united by a common language and a certain community of thought. As the land is, so is the literature : a vast heterogeneous mass, not easily reducible to any one distinct formula. To select a characteristic from such varieties, and say that is the spirit of German literature, must, on the face of it, be an arbitrary proceeding ; whatever we select will assuredly be liable to numerous counterstatements. Nevertheless with a full consciousness of what there is of arbitrary in the attempt, it will be necessary to make one here, if only for the sake of brevity. Let us then resolutely overlook all varieties, and fix our attention solely on the dominant type — that which has persisted through history, and is never wholly obscured by the temporary tendencies of the time. This dominant and persistent characteristic, which may be taken as the spirit of German literature, is Idealism — a much-abused word, which I am forced to use for want of a better. By Idealism is here understood what is often expressed by the words Spiritualism and Mysticism : the tendency to see in Nature a deeper and higher meaning than she carries in her face ; a tendency to disregard Matter or Form, as the mere body, the rude hieroglyph of Spirit ; a tendency which is also characterized by the word subjective.

This Idealism is pre-eminently German. It is also essentially Christian, and is thus diametrically opposed to the tendency of the Pagan mind. A comparison of Greek and Christian Art will serve to bring both characteristics into distinct relief.

The famous Tannhäuser legend will serve us an illustration of the Christian tendency. Tannhäuser, the German knight and minstrel, is lured by Venus into her enchanted domain on the Wartburg, where she and her nymphs live a voluptuous and thoroughly Pagan life, hateful to all Christians, as a life of mere sin and sensuousness. He passes some time with her in voluptuous oblivion of the world. Growing weary, and eager for change, he once more enters the world he had left, but finds himself under the universal ban. The mere fact of his having been in the Venusberg is tantamount to his having formally sold himself to the Evil One. Hunted by his former companions like a wild beast, and shunned by every Christian, he repairs repentant to Rome, to seek absolution from the Pope. But large as the power of absolution is, there are sins so tremendous that no absolution can remove them ; and when the Pope hears what has been the sin of Tannhäuser, he refuses pardon, and drives him forth to wander, like another Cain, homeless on the earth.

Such was the German conception of Venus, the mother of Love. She was no longer the Goddess Aphrodite, but a lovely Devil luring the souls of men to everlasting perdition. Nay, Ritter Tannhäuser himself, even when under her spell, knows she is not a Goddess, but tells her plainly, ‘ Oh Venus, my lovely wife, you know you are but a devil.’

‘O, Venus, schöne Fraue mein,
Ihr seyd eine Teufelinne!’

Nothing can be more unlike the Greek conception. In the story of Ulysses and Calypso, we have the same idea of a warrior passing years with a charmer; but when he quits her island no one thinks of shunning him; and he narrates his long residence there to Alcinous and Areta without raising one wrinkle of shocked respectability. Nay, so unlike to any Greek conception is this Tannhäuser story, that in the Legend of Phryne we have Beauty upheld as something sacred and awful. Phryne, while living at Athens in splendor, and wooed by men of rank and genius, was accused, like Aspasia, before the popular court of justice, of impiety. The judges were about to condemn her, when her defender, the orator Hyperides, bethought him of a bold stroke: he suddenly tore aside the garment which concealed the most beautiful of bosoms, and then ‘a deisidaimonia, i. e. a religious shudder of awe,’ so says an ancient writer, ‘seized the judges at the sight of this unveiled beauty. They believed that they should sin against Aphrodite herself, if by their verdict they destroyed a form which the goddess had consecrated as her earthly priestess, in thus endowing it with such wondrous beauty. They declared the accused free.’

These two typical legends aptly illustrate the two opposite modes of regarding Beauty. The one people thought that Beauty was ideal perfection — the culmination of Nature in the human form. The other people thought that Beauty was an accursed lure — the cunning instrument of the Evil One. The Crotonians, we are told by Heroditus, raised an altar to Philippos, ‘because he was beautiful.’ There is no altar the Christian would have smitten to the ground with deeper scorn. This difference arises from the antagonism of their religious conceptions. The Pagan deified nature, the Christian diabolized nature. Where the active fancy of the Greek filled woods, streams, valleys and rocks with hamadryads, naiads, gods who lived a free and godlike life ; the imagination of the Christian saw supernatural powers indeed, but powers of darkness, instruments wherewith Satan tempted and perplexed mankind. The early priests, who brought Christianity to the German shores, found there a mythology which — as elsewhere — they pronounced to belong to an Olympus of Hell. They never threw doubts on the existence of the supernatural beings, they simply declared them to be the agents of Satan.* And they were consistent. Their creed divided the powers of the world into a Good Principle and an Evil Principle, which were represented by Spirit and Matter. It is clear, therefore, that to give Satan the dominion of Matter, was to make the body hateful, and the senses tempters to a Pleasure which was Sin. The Christian reaction against the Pagan materialism was thus thoroughly spiritual ; the reaction was triumphant over an enervated society, ready for a change. Whatever was of this world was pronounced worthless ; this life had only value as a preparation for the life to come. How widely opposed such a conception was to that of the Greeks need not be insisted on ; it is enough to allude to the complaint of Achilles in Hades, that he would rather be a laborer on earth, toiling in the fields, than be king of Shades. This life was to the Greek what the life to come was to the Christian. Greek Art, therefore, is thoroughly realistic. But a great error is committed by those who say that Greek Art is distinguished from Christian Art by the absence of symbolism. It had its symbolism, wide and deep as the Christian, but the symbolism expressed a totally different order of conceptions. The Greek honored the body, and aimed at the perfect representation of it, because he deified nature, and strove to approach her as closely as possible. The Christian, on the contrary, despised the Body. He looked on Nature herself as partaking of the Fall, and thereby impure, alien from God. The Body, thus conceived as the perishable vehicle of the Soul, was not a fitting symbol. He did not try to express his Ideal in the Body, but beyond it.

* Grimm : Deutsche Mythologie, cap. xxvi.

This contrast is well seen in the early forms of each Art: the Eginetan statues, and the paintings of Giotto and Perugino. In the Eginetan sculpture the bodies are represented with a truth and beauty perfectly marvellous, when contrasted with the want of truth and expression in the faces, all of one type, and all with the same fixed smile. In Giotto and Perugino the faces are admirable in expression, but the figures are singularly ill-drawn and ungraceful. The Greek thought less of the soul than of the body, less of expression than of form. The face and its expression were to him only details of the general physiognomy of the external man. To the Christian the face was the physiognomy, for it expressed the soul. A complete Man was the ideal of the one, a complete Soul the ideal of the other.

In stating thus decisively that Realism is the dominant characteristic of the Greek mind, as Idealism is of the Christian, it may be worth while to guard against misconception, and correct a very general error, the error, namely, of supposing that the Greeks had no Spiritualism mingling with their Realism. What was before said of Germany equally applies to Greece; we may fix our attention on the dominant characteristic, but we must not forget that there are numerous varieties. Thus, even in the palmy days of Grecian thought we shall find thinkers as unmistakeably idealistic as any to be found in Germany. Xenophanes was such, Pythagoras was such, and we have only to look into Plato, or still more into Plotinus and the Alexandrian writers, to see an Idealism and an Asceticism comparable to the extremes of the middle-age extravagances.

I have dwelt on the capital distinction between Pagan and Christian Art as a means of more thoroughly elucidating the spirit of German Art. For German Art carries further than any other the Idealism which is essential to Christianity ; and indeed the words German and Christian are frequently used as convertible terms. The doctrines which changed the thought of Europe, were welcomed by the Germans, prepared to accept them. Already they had an Evil Principle,—Loki. They had their giants and dwarfs, their elves and kobolds, good and evil spirits. They had, moreover, Priestesses and Prophetesses ; and these women, whom they held to be divinely inspired, the Christians, by a natural consequence of the logic which turned gods into demons, accused of being inspired by the devil. The long and terrible history of Witchcraft tells what fanaticism could make of such logic. Inspiration which did not come from the Church, clearly came from the devil. Epileptic women were ‘possessed.’ Women who had more than ordinary acuteness were accused of witchcraft. This derivation of the Witch from the Priestess is but another illustration of that tendency to diabolize which may be seen running throughout the speculations and literature of the Middle Ages. The Church proclaimed itself sole possessor of the Truth, sole repository of inspiration, sole miracle-worker ; but as there were some wonders performed without the aid of the Church, the priests naturally declared those wonders counterfeits. For Satan was not only the enemy of God, he was in every way his imitator. There is a curious indication of this in the Celtic myth of Merlin the great magician, whom Satan in imitation begat from a virgin.* It is on this 'imitative action' of Satan that the whole world of magic and witchcraft rests. He parodied the holy miracles in devilish wonders; and as the Church had its inspired men, so had Satan his apostles and wonder-workers. The pious man gave his soul to God and renounced the world's pomps; the impious man gave his soul to the Devil for possession of the world's pomps. A formal compact and covenant gave Satan the reversion of a soul. Faust is a type of such covenants. But the Faust-legend is noble compared with the legend of the Witches' Sabbath.

Women, who from the earliest days had been regarded as weak, subordinate and somewhat accursed, and who in Eve had given the first example of willingness to listen to Satan, were selected by popular belief as the Chosen Ones of the Devil. Men also were chosen, and these were Wizards or Magicians; but they were less numerous than the witches, a fact which Sprenger, in his famous manual of witchcraft, Malleus Maleficarum, thinks it necessary to explain. Men and women paid a terrible penalty to superstition; they were persecuted and burnt by thousands. No one doubted the fact of their covenant with Satan. No one doubted that they held their Witches' Sabbath on the Blocksberg, and elsewhere, of which circumstantial narratives were ready to attest every detail. From nine o'clock till midnight Wizards and Witches assembled. Satan appeared, sometimes in the form of a lusty dancer gayly dressed, but mostly in the majestic form of a dusky, hideous man, half man, half goat, seated on a throne of gold and ebony. He wore a crown of little horns, and besides this crown he had two horns at the back of his head, and one upon his brow, which shed rays of light brighter than the moon. His large owl eyes flashed a fearful light. His fingers terminated in claws, his chin carried a goat's beard, a forked tail completed his terrible aspect. No sooner did he appear than the whole assembly knelt before him, denying God ; then kissing his left hand, left foot left side (with other less honorable parts of his person), they proclaimed him Lord. They confessed to him their sins, which consisted of going to church, honoring Christian ceremonies, and not doing all the evil which opportunity permitted. He awarded penances and absolution. Then began the Satanic Mass, at the close of which came the Sacrament of bread and wine ; but the hellish Host was black and tough, like an old shoe, and the wine bitter. Then followed the Witches' Dance, every face turned round, gazing at the festive tables. During the saturnalia the Devil embraced them one after the other, and bade them imitate him in doing evil whenever they could.

* Johannes Scherr : Geschichte Deutscher Cultur und Sitte, p. 354; a work to which I am indebted for many details.

This was no mere play of imagination, it was a devout belief ; to doubt was to incur the accusation of being in league with Satan ; those who were bold enough to express scepticism, were burnt as worse than heretics. The belief in witchcraft was by no means confined to Germany, but in Germany the belief was more fruitful than elsewhere. The legendary lore of the German people is mainly composed of what may be called the goblin-element. And very noticeable it is that when the Reformation came to scatter to the winds all the Legends of Catholicism, it never touched the true goblin-legend.

Luther believed not only in the Devil, but in witches, with hearty belief; and one day seeing a poor Cretin, he declared the boy was 'possessed,' and bade them throw him into the water.

However strong this Idealistic tendency, it was of course incapable, even when most dominant, of overruling entirely the Realism, which made men cling fast to Nature, and to Sensuous pleasures. We shall therefore at all times find a struggle between the two tendencies even in Germany; and it has been remarked that the two great poets of the middle ages, Wolfram von Eschenbach in his Parzival, and Gottfried von Strasburg in his Tristan und Isolde, represent the same Antagonism of Idealism and Realism, as Klopstock and Wieland, Schiller and Goethe, subsequently represented. Indeed, the progress of human development moves through a series of oscillations. One Idea rules the day, to be dethroned by an antagonist, which, in its turn, is dethroned. Every epoch has one dominant tendency, which in expressing itself exhausts itself; and thus, as Heine felicitously says, 'every age is a sphynx, which sinks into the earth as soon as its problem is solved.' Herein lies the secret of triumphant reactions.

In History, in Philosophy, in Art, there is a perpetual antagonism between Freedom and Despotism, Spiritualism and Materialism, Mysticism and Rationalism — or, to use our former distinction — Idealism and Realism. The struggle is supported by the clamorous instincts of mankind to look forward to an Age of Perfection, and to look backward to an Age of Gold. The contemplation of this antagonism asserting itself through successive reactions, has thrown some minds into scepticism, others into indifference. The ultimate reconciliation of these antagonists will only be possible when Philosophy and Art shall have acquired a fixed basis. That it will then be possible may be seen in the evidence furnished us by Science. There also we observe historically a similar succession of triumphant reactions, which however are finally closed as soon as a positive basis is established. In astronomy, physics and chemistry, we are no longer perplexed by fundamental changes, the changes are all in one direction of development, increasing every year our certainty and power. If in Biology there are still battles fought between the Materialists and Spiritualists, the reason is that Biology still wants the breadth of positive basis acquired by the other sciences. When Philosophy has once settled its basis, the oscillating movement of Progress will give place to a direct movement.

If we look at the early German Art, we shall see that while Idealism was its inspiration, the Realistic struggle was also active and finally triumphant. This Eastern Idealism which Christianity brought to Rome had there to combat the native inborn Realism of the Southern races. When Roman Catholicism began to express itself in Art, and to give Dogmas a Form, it necessarily appealed to Realism, in appealing to the Senses and Affections. Music, painting, sculpture, architecture, resting on a sensuous basis, could not make progress except through greater and greater predominance of Realism. And we see even the Northern nations borrowing their poetry and art from the Southern, i. e., becoming more and more realistic. In the so-called 'Romantic epoch,' in which the middle ages reached the flower of their Art, the spirit was German, but the form was Southern. The Minnesingers show the increasing encroachment of the worldly, realistic spirit over Christian asceticism: they sing the joys of love, of life, action and adventure, as if there were no doctrine of the worthlessness of the world and nothingness of life.

Nowhere is this realism more manifest than in the great national epos, the Nibelungen Lied, which, although reaching us in a form not more authentic than that of the Homeric poems, is nevertheless an authentic witness. Any poem more naïvely sensuous, more sincerely worldly, it would be difficult to name. The Minne's body, the beauty of the knight's body, are chaunted by the poet with frank admiration; the charms of mind being rarely, if ever, alluded to. The vigor of physical life, the splendor of dress, the glory of action, are dwelt on with delight; the next world, and all the thoughts which connect themselves with it, never seemed to trouble the actors. No profession of Christian doctrine is visible; not a trace of anything which belongs to the spiritualistic conception of life. It is as pagan as the Iliad.

The Nibelungen Lied is indeed a national product. It has undergone many modifications in the course of its existence, but there is no doubt that it is made up from the various legends which were current in the ballads of the people during the earliest days; and we may here remark that the notion of the existence of a special class of Bards in these early days is entirely discredited by German scholars; so that instead of attributing these ballads to a class of Bardic Homeridæ, we must attribute them to the general invention of the nation. In those days there were no Poets, there were only Singers; there was no Art of Poetry, but only a Song which issued from the heart of the nation. In this Song, the burden of which was familiar to all, every one joined; the harp was passed from hand to hand, and in chorus all the voices rose together. This singing together, which Tacitus noticed, is a German characteristic, and to it the Heroic Songs of the nation are due.* In contrast with this national song or * Vilmar Geschichte der Deutschen National Literatur, Sixth Edition, p. 25.

Volkspoesie, stands Poetic Art or Kunstpoesie, which is the work of individual genius, and in which the individual makes his worth felt in the ornament and arrangement of the material, in invention properly so called. The Volkspoesie, that which was the common property of the people, disappeared in the ninth century, when the pagan song gave place to priestly song, when the Heroes were banished and the Saints appeared. The old German Epos then gives place to the Christian Epos, the so-called Altsächsische Evangelienharmonie, which has Christ for the Hero, and the Gospel Narrative for subject-matter.

With the Crusades begins a new epoch. Before touching on this important epoch let us fix our attention on one fact, namely, that the Volkspoesie came really from the people, while the Kunstpoesie, as it is called, came from the court. The one was national, the other individual. A similar contrast exists in our own days between the Ballad whose parentage no one can trace, and the Poem which is the creation of an individual Poet. The Kunstpoesie arose in courts, and kings and courtiers were the poets. In the history of the national culture we see this courtly form of Art becoming more and more predominant. The consequences are twofold: First, poetry gradually ceases to be national both in its material and form, becomes more individual, and exclusively addresses individuals and a class; secondly, it becomes imitative, and this imitation is carried so far, that at last German nationality becomes a matter of scorn, as we see in Frederick the Great, and the imitators of French Literature.

It was in the period of the Crusades that this movement began. The Crusades developed a new life in poetry. From all parts of Europe the streams of various nationalities, united by a common faith, met to oppose the Saracen. The chiefs of these armies were in constant quarrel, but the people themselves were on excellent terms. The effects of such a collision of nationalities could not be other than important. One effect it is necessary to specify : The Crusades brought Poetry once more into the daily affairs of life, removed it from the exclusive hands of the clergy, and from the exclusive treatment of religious subjects. They made Art once more secular. The knight became a minstrel, or listened with pride to the recital of his deeds in verse. Nor was this all. His deeds, his heroism, his perils and warlike exercises suddenly became surrounded with a halo of righteousness. Hitherto his life had been without the sanction of a holy cause. He belonged to a religion of Peace, and his ways were the ways of war. Hence a life of violence was frequently closed by an old age of repentance. He quitted the turmoil of the tourney and the battle field, for the quiet of the cloister. He forsook the vanities of this world, to prepare himself for the glories of the next. With the Crusades came a change. The battle field was sacred, the very 'vanities' became instruments to work out the designs of Providence. The strong arm dealt a powerful blow for the holiest of causes. Life was no longer the ignoble struggle of sensualism rebuked by asceticism : it was a noble struggle, for a worthy aim. Thus was Realism reconciled with Idealism, and Poetry once more became the songs of daily life. This path, once opened, gradually became broader. A purely earthly ambition replaced the original religious motive. Frederick II. wanted to possess the Holy Land for himself, not merely to drive out the Infidel. Richard the Lion Heart thought more of chivalrous renown than of Christian glory. The knights thought more of their ladies than of the Virgin. They flocked to the east, arrayed in splendor, which Saint Bernard preached against in vain ; for woman's eyes ‘rained bright influence;’ woman’s colors were worn with ostentatious pride. The cross became a pretext.

The Crusades form a point of departure in European literature. They influenced all Europe, but in Germany, with which we have here to concern ourselves, the national character markedly modified this influence. The subjective tendency — in other words the Idealism — is seen predominating even amid this great outburst of Realism. The Ritterpoesie is less realistic than any other contemporary literature. Gervinus has noticed with emphasis the absence of war songs in this warlike age. ‘Who would believe it?’ he exclaims: ‘Among the thousands of songs which have come down to us from various knightly Minnesingers, and from different epochs — among all the products of an exclusively military race which had nothing to do but to wield the sword, and which could do nothing else; not one single war song has been discovered! Scarcely one in which the warlike valor of the knight is placed high.’ The lays of the Minnesingers are indeed all subjective; they are erotic or sentimental. The Troubadours of Provence mirror in their lays everything which varies life; the German minstrel mirrors nothing but his own feelings, and mostly the feelings of love. This contrast points to a national contrast. The Troubadour is gay, the Minnesinger sentimental. The one paints external life, the other paints internal life; one sings of war, of tourney, of courts, of wine, of friendship; the other sings of love and its sorrows; ερωτα μουνον ηξει. Nor is this contrast accidental; it lies in the national character. At the present day the same phenomenon is noticeable. Thus Shakespeare has become a national poet in Germany, almost as much as Goethe or Schiller; but the works of Shakespeare which hold the highest place in the national mind, are Hamlet and Romeo and Juliet, that is to say, plays of philosophy and love. Julius Cæsar, Othello, Coriolanus, Henry IV. — the masterpieces of passion, character and history, are admired, indeed, because they are Shakespeare's; but they have few such profound admirers as Hamlet and Romeo and Juliet.

Thus we see that during the very realistic reaction of the Ritter period the Idealistic tendency asserts itself. It emerges more distinctly into prominence during the so-called Didactic Period, in which we detect the national tendency to make Poetry the vehicle of Philosophy, — to think, where Art is content to feel. The poets borrow foreign stories, but they make them national by throwing into them a philosophic meaning; as we see in the mass of Christian Legends which were produced at this period.

It would take us too far to narrate the series of oscillations through which Literature moved. Enough if we allude to the Renaissance, which brought into Europe the revelation of the matchless Art of Antiquity, and which, by its example, banished the hideous sacrifice of Form to Meaning, and opened a field for healthy Realism in Art. Even Gothic Architecture, the sole product of the Middle Ages which has true artistic beauty, gave way to Grecian columns and Roman cupolas. In Painting, the triumphs of Leonardo, Raphael, Titian, and Correggio consecrated the realistic movement.

With the Reformation another change came. Idealism once more asserted itself. All the fair forms of Catholic Art were scouted, as the fair forms of Pagan Art had formerly been. German Literature from this time forward becomes a dreary table-land. Wherever it is not exclusively religious and protestant, it is drearily imitative. Imitation of the Classics and the French, however, once more brought back Realism. The old legends circulated among the people, but the poets wrote for courts and academies, not for the people. To write Latin or French, was necessary during a long period, when the German language was despised and neglected as the ‘language of horses.’ Remnants of this scorn still remain, especially in courts, where French is thought to be the language fittest for courtly mouths; and we have to remember that until Wolff no philosopher ever thought of writing in German; the great Leibnitz wrote Latin and French, never German. Early protests against this scorn had been made by Germans, but Logan and his admirers protested in vain. In 1650 the brave Moscherosch upbraided his countrymen for their want of nationality: — ‘O, more than unreasoning imitators! Have you ever known an animal so irrational as to change his voice and utterance to please another? Did you ever hear a cat bark to please a dog, or a dog mew for love of a cat? Did you ever hear a bird low or a cow whistle? And yet you would give up your own noble language which was born with you!’

Passing over this long and dreary period we arrive at the eighteenth century, when a new spirit was awakened, national and protestant. The Protest of the eighteenth century was twofold: 1. negative against Authority; and 2. positive in favor of nature. The negative protest was directed against French Taste as the authority in Literature; and against the letter of Scripture as the authority in Religion, — the authority with which Protestantism had replaced Papal Infallibility. To combat these Authorities, an appeal was made to Nature and to National Literature. In Art, Homer, Shakespeare, Legendary Lore, and the free spirit of earlier times were invoked as examples. In Religion, an appeal was made by the Rationalists to the natural judgment of man’s soul, and by the Pietists to the spirit of Christianity, as seen in the early ages. Klopstock Wieland, Lessing, and Herder thus prepared the way for Goethe and Schiller.

In Klopstock, born 1724, we see Idealism once more victoriously asserting itself: Fatherland and Christianity were the two sources of his inspiration. But he was too much of a poet not to have a large admixture of Realism, and too much of a German not to have a strong imitative tendency. Very remarkable it is in the history of German culture, to notice how, in the dull stagnant periods, Imitation of foreigners is the ruling motive, and how also revolutions are made by the substitution of one imitation for another. Like premature republicans, they cut off the head of their king, to place another on the throne. The shout of freedom rouses them to revolt; no sooner are they free, than the cry is, 'whom shall we obey?' Gervinus has remarked that the dictum of the Klopstock school was 'originality,' by which they opposed Winckelmann, who declared the only way to produce inimitable works was to imitate the ancients; and yet even this cry of originality was an imitation, borrowed from the English poet, Young. 'Curiously enough, even this notion of original genius is not original with us; and the great English drama, which was so far from being a copy, was copied in every way by our "original" poets!'

* Not only in the instance mentioned by Gervinus, but in the two great epochs of German literature which preceded, we notice a similar fact. The middle age culture is everywhere far more receptive and imitative than original, and the famous knightly-poetry is drawn from Arabia, through France, not from the German-Christian soil. Again, when with Opitz (1624) a new era begins, we see him drawing from French, Spanish and Italian models the rules for his Buch von der deutschen Poeterey, declaring it impossible for Germans to surpass them.

* Gervinus, iv. 419.

In Klopstock we see the three elements of Imitation, Christianity and Nature, all working towards Idealism. The poetry of Homer, Pindar and Ossian, lured him almost as much as the psalms of David, and the bards of his fatherland. His Odes are inspired by this triple love; some of them are religious, some bardic and some antique. His influence was instantaneous, immense, because it moved with the spirit of the time; if succeeding years have left him somewhat stranded on the shore, a wreck of the past, and not a living influence, we must not forget the services he performed in an age when he stood out as a giant. The very enthusiasm he excited, the high and priestly office which he gave the poet, as a real Vates, the services he rendered to the rebellious German language, will secure for him a grateful recognition even among those wearied by his odes and epic.

Klopstock went back to Nature, as well as to the early Singers. He vindicated Realism by his free and joyous habits, by gymnastic exercises, by skating, of which he was passionately fond, and for which he wrote laws with something of Solonic gravity; by horsemanship, by bathing and by admiration of pretty women. His Idealism was no asceticism. Like Milton, he was an accomplished cavalier, and like Milton, passionately fond of music. Remembering Coleridge's sarcasm, I will hasten to add that the resemblance to Milton must not be pushed much farther; if he is a German Milton, he is indeed very German. All such parallels have necessarily an imperfect side, but if one must be made, I would call Klopstock a German Wordsworth rather than a German Milton; not so much in reference to the quality of his poetry, as to his life and his position in national literature. The first three cantos of the Messias, published in 1748, a year before Goethe's birth, produced a wonderful impression. The rest of the poem was delayed till 1773, much to the regret of his admirers, who were tempted to curse the generous patron whose pension enabled the poet to be thus idle. But in truth a change had come over him. He grew melancholy, was troubled with desires for death, and only cared to live that he might finish his religious poem; and, as Lessing said, he began to correct his verses more with a view to orthodoxy than to art.

If in Klopstock we have the representative of German Idealism, in Wieland we have the representative of German Realism. They are contrasts in all essentials. Wieland is sensuous where Klopstock is supersensuous, rational where Klopstock is sentimental; philosophy and history rule his muse, as religion and music ruled that of Klopstock; and he is eminently didactic where Klopstock is eminently lyrical. Wieland had a marked preference for the later classics, and the French and Italian poets, as Klopstock had for the northern and English. Voltaire was to Wieland what Young was to Klopstock. Even on English ground the same contrast is observable. Wieland takes up Shaftesbury and Shakespeare; Klopstock, — Young, Richardson and Milton. Klopstock was 'terribly in earnest,' as Kemble said of Kean; Wieland was a gay, light, wandering nature, incapable of any profound earnestness. If we have called one the German Wordsworth, we may call the other, in the same loose way, the German Moore. It was the fashion to call Wieland a Greek, because he wrote pleasant tales, of a Frenchified Hellenic cast; but although in Agathon, for example, a certain reflex of Grecian culture and Grecian light is visible; yet, as in an old Palimpsest you may still trace the rugged, ineffaceable writing of some monkish homily which has been made to cede the place to a pleasant legend, so under this surface-polish of culture, the German Wieland is unmistakeably legible.

Wieland, born in 1733, early displayed the characteristics of his later years, and preluded to that fluctuating Imitation which, through life, was his inspiration. He confessed that he could read nothing with delight which did not set him to work at imitating it ; and all his works are imitative. He began his studies at three years of age, and at seven read Cornelius Nepos with enthusiasm. Between his twelfth and sixteenth years he read all the Roman writers, with Voltaire, Fontenelle and Bayle. Xenophon and Addison followed ; and in his seventeenth year he wrote an imitation of Lucretius (1751), and played off Bayle and Leibnitz against Aristotle, to the delight of a public which had the sublime stupidity to accept him as the ‘German Lucretius.’ The young Realist boldly proclaimed that Happiness was the aim of Creation, the greatest psalm which could be sung in the Creator’s glory. He changed about, however, and passed over to the pietists for a time ; but the imitative tendency which led him thither, as readily led him away again to Xenophon, Anacreon, Lucian and the French. He stood in terror of Lessing ; and his own disposition also moved him towards lighter, cheerfuller, views of life. Lessing had made him acquainted with Shakespeare, and his prose translation of our greatest poet, which appeared in 1762–66, was the best service he rendered his nation.

In 1762 Wieland was brought into contact with ‘good society,’ through Graf Stadion, and made acquaintance not only with the world but with many English and French writers of the moral deistical school, who completed his emancipation from the pietists, and taught him how to write for ‘the world.’ He became the favorite poet of good society. His tales and poems were all animated with an epicurean morality, and written with a certain lightness and grace (German lightness and German grace : they never lost the national character) which gradually passed from lightness into voluptuousness and obscenity, qualities not less acceptable to the mass of his readers, in spite of the indignation they roused in sterner circles. He appealed, indeed, piteously against his critics, from his lax writings to his moral life, and wished they 'could see him in his quiet domestic home, they would then judge otherwise of him.' In truth, his life was blameless, and he might, with Martial, have thrown the blame of his writings on his readers :

'Seria cum possim, quod delectantia malim
Scribere; tu causa es, Lector amice, mihi
Qui legis et tota cantas mea carmina Roma.'

At the time of Goethe's appearance Wieland was in this bad odor, as we have before noted ; but he lived through it, and wrote his masterpiece, Oberon, when Goethe was with him in Weimar.

Klopstock and Wieland as Idealist and Realist, with an Anglomania and a Gallomania, began a revolution of which they were the Girondins. The real revolutionary Captain, the real leader of the German mind, was Gott-hold Ephraim Lessing, one of the greatest critics the world has seen, and certainly the greatest prose writer of Germany. Born 1729, just twenty years older than Goethe therefore, and thirty years older than Schiller, he was, as Gervinus truly says, the great finger-post of his nation ; leading it from the regions of Cherubim and Seraphim, whither Klopstock pointed, and from the distant Wonderland of Fable whither Wieland pointed, he brought it back to the German Home. He wrote genuine German ; * and created a German prose, such as no writer has on the whole surpassed, and very few approached. This of itself was no small service. But his services lie in almost every direction : Religion, Philosophy, Art, Drama, Scholarship, everywhere an innovator, everywhere strong, clear, decisive ; nowhere an imitator. In this, as in so many respects, he was unlike his nation ; indeed, profound and manysided as his influence has been, it has always been rather that of a counterpoise to German tendencies, than of additional momentum, simply because his nature was antagonistic to that of his nation. He had no Idealism, no Sentimentalism, no Schwärmerei. His intellect, like his style, was clear, sharp, precise ; he would tolerate no vagueness, and he hated rhetoric ; a keen, analytic, healthy intellect, practical in all its aims, decisive in its movement, inspired by the sincerest love of truth, but never inspired by imagination.

Forever wandering from city to city, as from topic to topic, a restless gladiator for the Truth, throwing fragments, never systems, to the public, writing to clear his own mind of doubts, and publishing to submit his doubts to others, he is the most revolutionary writer of that, or perhaps of any age. In one of his Theological Fragments he begins with the intention of tearing it to pieces, should he succeed in satisfying his own mind during composition ; should he not succeed, he will publish it, that others may take up his doubts, and carry them to better issues. ‘It is not Truth,’ he said in reply to Goeze, * Lessing schrieb Deutsch. Gervinus, iv. p. 319. Admirable as this work is in so many respects (superior to all literary histories known to me), there is no chapter of it more remarkable than this on Lessing.

‘which makes man worthy, but the striving after Truth. If God in His right hand held every Truth, and in His left the one Inward Impulse after Truth, although with the condition that I should err forever, and bade me choose, — I would humbly incline to his left hand, saying, “O Father, give me that : pure Truth is for Thee alone.”’ No man but one who felt a genuine love of Truth dared have said that ; no one but a man of a genuine fighting activity could have conceived it. How Lessing fought, how incessantly, and how nobly, is known to every student of German Literature, where his rank is among the proudest glories of the nation.

In Religion, Lessing is the real successor to Luther. He fought against the letter of Scripture as Luther fought against Church pretensions ; he appealed incessantly to the verdict of Reason against Authority. In Literature he combated arbitrary rules, let them call themselves by what name they pleased. The French Taste was paramount in the Drama : he attacked it with terrible wit and pitiless logic : placing in contrast Plautus, Sophocles, and Shakespeare. His Litteratur Briefe and his Hamburgische Dramaturgie startled, staggered, and finally conquered the nation. His Minna von Barnhelm was a national drama, which crowded the stage with soldatesque pieces, as Götz subsequently did with chivalry pieces. That piece, as well as the more ambitious, but far less successful Emilia Galotti, still keeps the stage ; and the noble Nathan der Weise still speaks to the people its elevated accents of humanity and tolerance.

Lessing had the erudition of a German, but no erudite German was ever so little of a bookworm. In everything he looked to the end ; but did not, like so many self-styled practical men, therefore overlook the means. He knew the worth of books ; no man better ; and all the better, because he held them as books. In the same way he knew the worth of Rules. He did not fight against them as Rules, but against them as irrational. There were rules founded in reason, and rules founded on mistaken notions. To suppose that rules cramped genius was laughable; genius could not be cramped, and above all, not by the rules which, according to the theorists, had been originated by genius; but if the fear of rules cramping genius was absurd, still more absurd was the belief that rules could make genius. We must not be surprised to find, therefore, in Lessing's writings the most exhaustive erudition, and the highest respect for what reason justifies in the masterpieces of the past. Without calling on his nation to imitate Homer, Sophocles, Plautus and Shakespear, he calls on his nation to study them.

The Laokoon, which still remains the masterpiece of Art-criticism, and in which we see the principles that Goethe and Schiller afterwards so strenuously upheld, is very characteristic of Lessing's mind. He strives to make clear to artists the boundaries of the several arts, believing that there is a natural inclination to mingle what belongs to one mode of representation with what belongs to another; this intermingling of styles he calls a sign of decay. The analytic tendency of his mind is seen in the Laokoon; another tendency is also seen, which is equally characteristic: the tendency to pure Realism. He loved a beautiful landscape, but, German though he was, never felt any of the soft sadness and mystic witchery felt by moderns. He looked on Nature as a Greek looked on her, seeing nothing behind the panorama. He called the modern feeling for Nature, the feeling which the invalid has for Health. Passionately fond of Plastic Art, he was insensible to Music; and in Plastic Art he preferred Sculpture to Painting, Design to Color. In Poetry he preferred

Homer to Sophocles and Shakespeare, and these to every one else. He demanded Poetry for men, not for women and boys. Very characteristic it is that in those days of enthusiasm for Ossian, who was placed beside, when not above, Homer, Lessing never once mentions him.

We are touching the weak place in thus touching on the strong ; we approach the defect in indicating the great quality of his mind. Lessing's intellect was clear, strong, healthy, but it was not impassioned, it was not winged with powers which could carry it to the height of genius. He knew it well ; he confessed himself no poet ; confessed he was a Thinker in whom was wanting that enthusiasm which is the flower of genius. It is as a critic therefore that he lives, and it is owing to the clearness of his intellect rather than the force of his genius, that his plays are of 'eternal substance.'

The enthusiasm, sentimentalism, and rhetoric which Lessing wanted are to be found in Herder (born 1744), who is the next great critical name in German literature. Herder is the lineal descendant of Lessing, imitating his revolutionary efforts, helping to disseminate his ideas, and succeeding in carrying them further by reason of the very qualities which distinguished him from Lessing. The works published about this period, namely, Fragmente zur Deutschen Literatur, 1767 ; the Kritische Wälder, 1769 ; and Von Deutscher Art und Kunst, 1773, show Lessing's influence as the groundwork, with Hamann's and his own rhetorical, and theologico-poetical tendencies, as variations. If Lessing is now best known by his Laokoon and Nathan, Herder is almost exclusively known by his Ideas towards a History of Mankind : the contrast between these works is all the greater, because of the evident parentage. Herder had something of the Hebrew Prophet in him, but the Hebrew Prophet fallen upon Deistical times, with Spinoza and Lessing for teachers. To complete the contrast between Lessing and Herder, it may be added that both were Critics rather than Poets; but the clear rational poetry of Lessing survives, while the rhetoric of Herder is altogether forgotten. Both greatly influenced their nation, Herder perhaps more than Lessing at the time; but as the waves of time roll on they leave Herder more and more behind, scarcely washing anything away of the great Lessing.

Herder's merit, according to Gervinus, is that he gave an impulse to poetic activity, less through his own example than through his union of Imagination and Fancy with æsthetical criticism, thus throwing a bridge over from criticism, to poetry. From youth upwards there was something in him solitary, visionary and sensitive; he was never seen to leap and play like other boys, but wandered lonely with his thoughts. A vast ambition, resting on a most predominating vanity, made him daring in Literature, bitter, and to many unendurable, in intercourse. His sensitive nerves forbidding the study of Medicine, he chose that of Theology. He became one of Germany's most renowned preachers; but although his loved wife weaned him from the early 'freethinking,' he never to the last became what could be called orthodox; he was, so to speak, a rhetorical Spinoza 'in orders.'

Although Herder was not more a poet than Lessing, he had more of the poetical element in his nature; but it was confused, and instead of ripening into fruit, ran to seed in rhetoric. This fault, which was also a quality, brought him nearer to his age and nation. It gave a charm to his teaching. It roused enthusiasm. It aided his efforts towards the dissemination of Ossian, Hebrew Poetry, and old German Literature, especially old ballads.

It was in this agitation and revolution that Goethe made his appearance, to sum up all the tendencies of his age, and to express them, not in critical disquisitions, but in works of genius. His success was instantaneous, for he performed what others prescribed. He was not an imitator, but he walked on the paths which had been prepared. As he wisely says : In der wahren Kunst giebt es keine Vorschule, wohl aber Vorbereitungen.* What preparations had been made for him, he used, but he used them as an original genius uses the materials at hand.

Goethe was by nature a Realist, and his relation therefore to the Idealism of his nation must at all times have been equivocal. As a child of the age he could not escape its tendencies, but as a man organically opposed to those tendencies, he could only write as a Greek born in Germany during the later half of the eighteenth century, and treat Idealism in a thoroughly realistic style : and this he did. Had he been pure Greek he would not so have moved his nation ; had he not expressed the tendencies of his age he must have been dumb. In Götz and Werther the clear objective spirit is as visible as in Iphigenia or Hermann und Dorothea. The true poetic Idealist is Schiller. But at the time now spoken of, Schiller was a boy of fifteen. Coincident with his rise into eminence, is the open rupture of Goethe with the Sturm und Drang school. When Schiller comes to represent Idealism, Goethe has proclaimed himself the representative of Realism : and the two great Leaders have their separate camps. The nation felt it, and felt, as Gervinus remarks, that these two alone were the independent representatives of German poetry, for ‘ while * ‘ In true Art there is no school where Art can be learned, but simply Preparations.’ Here, as so often occurs, I am forced to content myself with a poor paraphrase.

Klopstock was called our Milton, Wieland our Voltaire, and Jean Paul our Sterne, and others in the same way, Goethe and Schiller were never other than themselves.'

In Goethe we see united the two great tendencies of Realism and Idealism, and the two essential conditions of National Art — the treatment of national material, and the perfect art of that treatment.

CHAPTER VII.

CLAVIGO.

RETURNING from this digression, we find Goethe now at the perilous juncture in an author's career, when, having just achieved a splendid success, he is in danger either of again snatching at laurels in presumptuous haste, or of suffering himself to repose upon the laurels he has won, talking of greatness, instead of learning to be great. Both perils he avoided. He neither traded on his renown, nor conceived that his education was complete. Wisely refraining from completing fresh important works, he kept up the practice of his art by trifles, and the education of his genius by serious studies.

Among these trifles are Clavigo, the Jahrmarktsfest zu Plundersweilern, and the Prolog zu Bahrdr's Neuesten Offenbarungen. For the composition of Clavigo we must retrace our steps a little, and once more see him in the Frankfurt circle during the summer of 1774, that is, before the publication of Werther, which was delayed till October. In his sister's pleasant circle we have already noticed Anna Sybilla Münch, who was fascinating enough to fix his attentions. They were accustomed to meet once a week, in picnics and pleasure parties; at one of these it was agreed to institute a marriage lottery. He thus speaks of it: 'Every week lots were drawn to determine the couples who should be symbolically wedded; for it was supposed that every one knew well enough how lovers should conduct themselves, but few had any proper conceptions of the requisite demeanor between man and wife. General rules were laid down to the effect that these wedded couples should preserve a polite indifference, not sitting near each other, nor speaking to each other too often, much less indulging in anything like caresses. At the same time, side by side with this polite indifference, this well-bred calm, anything like discord or suspicion was to be sedulously avoided; and whoever succeeded in gaining the affections of his wife without using the importunities of a lover, was supposed to have achieved their ideal. Much sportive confusion and agreeable pleasantries of course arose from this scheme.' Strangely enough, to him it fell thrice to have the same girl appointed by hazard to fill the place of his wife. When fate had brought them together for the third time, it was resolved unanimously that they should be no longer separated, that heaven had spoken, and that hereafter they were to consider themselves as man and wife, and not to draw lots as the others did. At these réunions something new was generally read aloud by one of the party. One evening Goethe brought with him as a novelty the 'Mémoire' of Beaumarchais. During the conversation which ensued, Goethe's partner said to him: 'If I were thy liege lady, and not thy wife, I would command thee to change this memoir into a play, to which it seems well suited.' He answered: 'That thou mayest see, my love, that liege lady and wife are one, I here undertake that this day week I will read a play on this very matter.' So bold a promise excited astonishment, but he resolved on fulfilling it. What, in such cases,' he says, 'is termed invention, was with me spontaneous. While escorting my titular wife home I was silent; and on her inquiring the cause, I told her that I was thinking out the play, and had already got into the middle of it — intending to show her how gladly I would do anything to please her. Upon which she pressed my hand, and I snatched a kiss. ‘Thou must not step out of thy character,’ she exclaimed; ‘they say it is not proper for married folks to be loving.’ ‘Let them say what they please,’ I replied, ‘we will have it our own way.’

He confesses that before reading the play aloud, the subject had appeared to him eminently dramatic; though, without such a stimulus as he had received, this piece, like so many others, would have remained among the number of possible creations. The only novelty in it was his mode of treating the villains. He was weary of those characters so frequently represented, who from revenge, or from hate, or from trivial motives, ruin a noble nature; and he wished in Carlos to show the working of clear, good sense, against passion and inclination. Justified by the precedent of Shakespeare, he translated, word for word, the chief scene, and such portions of the memoir as were dramatic; borrowing the dénouement from an English ballad. He was ready before the week expired, and read the piece to a delighted audience.

A few words on this memoir may be useful. Beaumarchais had two sisters living in Madrid, one married to an architect, the other, Marie, engaged to Clavijo, a young author without fortune. No sooner had Clavijo obtained the office he had long solicited, than he refused to fulfil his promise. Beaumarchais hurried to Madrid; his object was twofold: to save the reputation of his sister, and to put a little speculation of his own on foot. He sought Clavijo, and by his sangfroid and courage, extorted from him a written avowal of his contemptible conduct. No sooner was this settled, than Clavijo, alarmed at the consequences, solicited a reconciliation with Marie, offering to marry her. Beaumarchais consents, but just as the marriage is about to take place he learns that Clavijo is secretly conspiring against him, accusing him of having extorted the marriage by force, in consequence of which he has procured an order from the government to expel Beaumarchais from Madrid. Irritated at such villany, Beaumarchais goes to the ministers, reaches the king, and avenges himself by getting Clavijo dismissed from his post. This is, in brief, the substance of the Mémoire which appeared in February, 1774. The adventure occurred in 1764, so that Clavijo, who subsequently became a distinguished writer, might have seen himself not only held up to odium in the sparkling pages of Beaumarchais, but represented on the stage of every German theatre. He died in 1806, vice-president of the Natural History Society in Madrid, having previously translated Buffon, and edited the Mercurio historico y politico de Madrid. We must suppose that Goethe knew nothing of the existence of Clavijo, when he wrote the drama.

With Beaumarchais in our hands it is curious to read Clavigo, which is as close a reproduction as the dramatic form admits; and is an evidence that Goethe did wisely in not at once proceeding to complete Faust (fragments of which were written), or Cæsar. He would infallibly have repeated himself. He has repeated himself in Clavigo: the external circumstances are changed, but the experience is the same. Clavigo is another Weislingen, and was meant to be so: 'I have written a tragedy,' Goethe writes to Schönborn, 'Clavigo, a modern anecdote, dramatized with the greatest simplicity and heartfelt truth. My hero is an irresolute, half-great, half-little man, the pendant to Weislingen, or rather Weislingen himself as the chief person.' He has well portrayed the weak, ambitious nature of one who hopes to rise still higher in the world, but feels his career obstructed by a passion which made him happy in the obscure days of penniless youth. The popular author and court favorite aspires to some woman of rank ; an aspiration in which he is encouraged by his friend Carlos, who mockingly strips off the garlands with which the poet's imagination had decked his mistress.

Marie is a weak, sensitive creature, without much individuality, and is perhaps the poorest sketch Goethe has given of a woman. There is, however, one little touch which shows the poet ; it is a sentence which escapes Marie, when Clavigo returns repentant to her feet, appealing to her affection : she throws herself on his neck, exclaiming, ' Ah, sister, whence knows he that I love him so — woher weiss er dass ich ihn so liebe ! '

Marie is overjoyed at Clavigo's return, but her joy is brief. The demon of ambition, aided by the cold sarcasms of Carlos (in whom we see the germ of Mephistopheles), once more troubles Clavigo, and turns him from a marriage so ill suited to his hopes. Carlos bitterly, but truly, says to him, ' There is nothing in the world so pitiable as an undecided man, who wavers between two feelings, hoping to reconcile them.' He suggests that Beaumarchais should be assassinated. ' He who orders the assassination of the brother, pantomimically intimates that he will have nothing to do with the sister ; ' adds Carlos, quite in the Mephistophelic tone. They determine on a contemptible plan. Beaumarchais is to be imprisoned for having insulted and threatened Clavigo under his own roof. The order for arrest arrives, and Marie dies broken-hearted at the treachery of her lover.

Up to this point — short at least of the death of Marie — Beaumarchais' Mémoire has been faithfully followed ; a fifth act is added, with a dénouement to fit it for the stage. This is so brief, and yet so effective, that I give it here, in Taylor's translation.

ACT V.

SCENE I. — The Street before the House of Gilbert. — Night.

(The house is open. Before the door stand three men clad in black mantles, holding torches. Clavigo enters, wrapt in a cloak, his sword under his arm; a servant goes before him with a torch.)

Clavigo. I thought I told you to avoid this street.

Servant. We must have gone a great way round, sir, and you are in such haste. It is not far hence where Don Carlos is lodged.

Clavigo. Torches there!

Servant. A funeral. Come on, sir.

Clavigo. Maria's abode! A funeral! A death-agony shudders through all my limbs. Go, ask, whom they are going to bury.

Servant (to the men). Whom are you going to bury?

The Men. Maria de Beaumarchais.

Clavigo (sits down on a stone and covers himself in a cloak).

Servant (comes back). They are going to bury Maria de Beaumarchais.

Clavigo (springing up). Traitor, must thou repeat it? Repeat that word of thunder, which strikes all the marrow out of my bones?

Servant. Peace, sir! Come on, sir. Consider the danger by which you are surrounded.

Clavigo. To hell with thee; reptile! I remain.

Servant. O, Carlos! O, that I could find thee! — Carlos! — he has lost his reason. [Exit.

SCENE II. — CLAVIGO. — The mutes in the distance.

Clavigo. Dead! Maria dead! Torches! her dismal attendants! It is a trick of enchantment, a night vision which terrifies me; which holds up to me a picture, in which I may see anticipated the end of all my treacheries. But there is still time. Still! I tremble — my heart melts with horror! No! no! thou shall not die — I come, I come! — Vanish, ye spirits of the night, which with your horrible terrors set yourselves in my way. (He goes up to them.)

Vanish!—They remain! Ha! they look around after me! Woe! woe is me! They are men like myself.—It is true! true!—Canst thou comprehend it? She is dead!—It seizes me amid all the horror of midnight—the feeling—that she is dead. There she lies, the flowers at her feet!—and thou—O have mercy on me God in heaven—I have murdered her? Hide yourselves, ye stars, look not down! You who have so often beheld the villain, in feelings of the most heartfelt happiness leave this threshold; through this street float along in golden dreams with music and song, and enrapture his maiden listening at the secret casement and lingering in transport. And now I fill the house with wailing and sorrow—and this scene of my bliss with the funeral song—Maria! Maria! take me with thee! take me with thee! (A mournful music utters a few sounds from within.) They are beginning the way to the grave.—Stop! Stop! Shut not the coffin—Let me see her yet once. (He runs up to the house.) Ha! into whose presence am I rushing? whom to face amid their horrible sorrows? Her friends! Her brother! Whose breast is panting with raging grief. (The music recommences.) She calls me! She calls me! I come!—What anguish is this which overwhelms me! What shuddering withholds me!

SCENE III.

(The music begins for the third time, and continues. The torches move before the door; three others come out to them, who range themselves in order, to inclose the funeral procession, which now comes out of the house. Six bearers carry the bier, upon which lies the coffin, covered. Gilbert and Buenco follow next in deep mourning.)

Clavigo (coming forward with majesty). Halt!

Gilbert. What voice is that?

Clavigo. Halt! (The bearers stop.)

Buenco. Who dares to interrupt the solemn funeral?

Clavigo. Set it down. (The bearers set it down.)

Gilbert. Ha!

Buenco. Wretch! are thy deeds of shame not yet ended? Is thy victim not safe from thee in the coffin?

Clavigo. No more! make me not frantic. The miserable are dangerous; I must see her. (He tears off the pall and the lid of the coffin. Maria is seen lying within it, clad in white, her hands clasped before her; Clavigo steps back, and covers his face.)

Buenco. Wilt thou awake her, to murder her again?

Clavigo. Poor mocker! — Maria! (He falls down before the coffin.) SCENE IV. — BEAUMARCHAIS comes up the street. The former.

Beaumarchais. Buenco has left me. They say she is dead. I must see her; spite of hell, I must see her. Ha! torches! a funeral. (He runs hastily up to it, gazes on the coffin and falls down speechless. They raise him up; he is deprived of sense; Gilbert holds him.)

Clavigo (who is standing on the other side of the coffin). Maria! Maria!

Beaumarchais (springing up). That is his voice. Who calls Maria? At the sound of that voice what burning rage starts into my veins!

Clavigo. It is I.

Beaumarchais (staring wildly around and grasping his sword. Gilbert holds him.)

Clavigo. I fear not thy blazing eyes, nor the point of thy sword. Oh! look here, here, on these closed eyes — these clasped hands.

Beaumarchais. Dost thou show me that sight? (He tears himself loose, runs upon Clavigo, who instantly draws; they fight; Beaumarchais pierces him through the breast.)

Clavigo. I thank thee, brother; thou marriest us. (He falls upon the coffin.)

Beaumarchais (tearing him away). Hence from this saint, thou fiend!

Clavigo. Alas! (The bearers raise up his body and support him.)

Beaumarchais. His blood! Look up, Maria, look upon thy bridal ornaments, and then close thine eyes forever. See! how I have consecrated thy place of rest with the blood of thy murderer! Charming! glorious!

SCENE V. — SOPHIA from the house. The former.

Sophia. My brother? O, my God! — what is the matter?

Beaumarchais. Draw near, my love, and see! I hoped to have strewn her bridal bed with roses; see the roses with which I adorn her on her way to heaven.

Sophia. We are lost!

Clavigo. Save yourself, inconsiderate young man! save yourself, ere the dawn of day. May God, who sent you for an avenger, conduct you ! Sophia, forgive me. Brothers, friends, forgive me.

Beaumarchais. How the sight of his gushing blood extinguishes all the burning vengeance within me ! how with his departing life vanishes all my rage ! (Going up to him.) Die, I forgive thee.

Clavigo. Your hand ! and your's, Sophia — and your's ! (Buenco hesitates.)

Sophia. Give it him, Buenco.

Clavigo. I thank you ; you are still as good as ever ; I thank you. And thou, O spirit of my beloved, if thou still hoverest around this place, look down, see these heavenly kindnesses, bestow thy blessing, and do thou too forgive me. I come ! I come ! — Save yourself, my brother. Tell me, did she forgive me ? How did she die ?

Sophia. Her last word was thy unhappy name. She departed without taking leave of us.

Clavigo. I will follow her, and bear your farewells to her.

SCENE VI. — CARLOS, a Servant. The former.

Carlos. Clavigo ! murder !

Clavigo. Hear me, Carlos ! Thou seest here the victim of thy prudence ; and now I conjure thee, for the sake of that blood, in which my life irrevocably flows away — save my brother.

Carlos. O, my friend ? (to the servant) are you standing there ? Fly for a surgeon. [Servant exit.]

Clavigo. It is in vain ; save, save my unhappy brother ; thy hand in assurance of it. They have forgiven me, and so I forgive thee. Accompany him to the frontiers, and — oh !

Carlos (stamping with his feet). Clavigo ! Clavigo !

Clavigo (Drawing nearer to the coffin, upon which they lay him down). Maria ! — Thy hand ! (He uncloses her hands, and grasps her right hand.)

Sophia (to Beaumarchais). Hence, unhappy one, away.

Clavigo. I have her hand, her cold dead hand. Thou art mine. Yet this last bridegroom's kiss.

Sophia. He is dying. Save thyself, brother.

(Beaumarchais falls on Sophia's neck. She returns the embrace, and makes a sign for him to withdraw.)

Powerful as this scene is in theatrical effect, one cannot but admit that æsthetically it is poor and almost commonplace. The clumsiness by which the meeting is contrived has been noticed by Rosenkranz.* Clavigo is seeking Carlos; he orders the servant who lights the way not to pass through the street where the Beaumarchais family resides, yet the servant actually leads him there, because it is the shorter route. The whole tone of this fifth act is not in harmony with what precedes. The act is grafted on — it does not grow out of — the subject.

As a stage play the interest is great: the situations are effective; the dramatic collision perfect; the plot is clearly and rapidly evolved; the language vigorous, passionate and pointed. But it must not be tried by any high standard. Merck, anxious about his friend's reputation, would not consent to judge the play according to the theatre-standard, but exclaimed, 'Such trash as this you must not write again; others can do that!' Goethe says, that in this Merck was wrong, and for the first time did him an injury. 'We should not in all things transcend the notions which men have already formed; it is right that much should be done in accordance with the common way of thinking. Had I written a dozen such pieces (and it would have been easy to do so with a little stimulus), three or four of them would perhaps have kept their place upon the stage.'

This can scarcely be accepted as conclusive reasoning. Merck might have replied, 'Perhaps so; but you have genius fit for higher things than stage-plays.' Nevertheless, as before hinted, I think Goethe was right in his course, although the reasons he alleges are unsatisfactory. Clavigo, like the other trifles he composed at this period, must be regarded as the sketches with which an artist fills his portfolio, not the works which are to brighten galleries. The impulse to create was imperious ; if trifles were demanded, he created trifles. His immense activity was forced to expend itself on minor works, because he dimly felt himself unripe for greater works.

* Goethe und Seine Werke, p. 185.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE LITERARY LION.

ANNA SYBILLA MÜNCH was not a little flattered by the homage of Clavigo, and smiled more tenderly on her admirer. Hopes of a marriage rose not only in her breast, but in the breasts of his parents, who, having lost by marriage their daughter, Cornelia, greatly wished to see a daughter-in-law in their house. They talked over the matter ; seem to have alluded to it also to Anna herself ; and frequently joked their son at table on the expected event. It was thought that he might first make his long-talked-of journey to Italy, and marry on his return. At no time prone to marriage, he had not in this instance the impulse of passion. He admired Anna, but he felt no passion for her ; and even Italy, so long desired, was now less attractive to him than Germany, where he was beginning to feel himself a man of consequence, and where the notable men of the day eagerly sought his acquaintance.

Among these men we must note Klopstock, Lavater, Basedow, Jacobi and the Stolbergs. Correspondence led to personal intercourse. Klopstock arrived in Frankfurt in this October 1774, just before Werther appeared. Goethe saw him, read the fragments of Faust to him, and discussed skating with him. But the great religious poet was too far removed from the strivings of his young rival to conceive that attachment for him which he felt for men like the Stolbergs, or to inspire Goethe with any keen sympathy.

In June, Lavater also came to Frankfurt. This was a few months before Klopstock's visit. He had commenced a correspondence with Goethe on the occasion of the Briefe des Pastors. Those were great days of correspondence. Letters were written to be read in circles, and were shown about like the last new poem. Lavater pestered his friends for their portraits and for ideal portraits (according to their conception) of our Saviour, all of which were destined for the work on Physiognomy on which Lavater was then engaged. The artist who took Goethe's portrait sent Lavater the portrait of Bahrtdt instead, to see what he would make of it; the physiognomist was not taken in; he stoutly denied the possibility of such a resemblance. Yet when he saw the actual Goethe he was not satisfied. He gazed in astonishment, exclaiming 'Bist's? Art thou he?' 'Ich bin's. I am he,' was the answer; and the two fell on each other's necks. Still the physiognomist was dissatisfied. 'I answered him with my native and acquired Realism, that as God had willed to make me what I was, he, Lavater, must even so accept me.'

The first surprise over, they began to converse on the weightiest topics. Their sympathy was much greater than appears in Goethe's narrative, written many years after the real characters of both had developed themselves: Goethe's into what we shall subsequently see; Lavater's into that superstitious dogmatism and priestly sophistication which exasperated and alienated so many.

Lavater forms a curious figure in the history of those days: a compound of the intolerant priest, and the factitious sentimentalist. He had fine talents, and a streak of genius, but he was ruined by vanity and hypocrisy. Born in Zurich 1741, he was eight years Goethe's senior. In his autobiographic sketch* he has represented himself indicating as a child the part he was to play as a man. Like many other children, he formed for himself a peculiar and intimate relation with God, which made him look upon his playfellows with scorn and pity, because they did not share his 'need and use of God.' He prayed for wonders, and the wonders came. God corrected his school exercises. God concealed his many faults, and brought to light his virtuous deeds. In fact, Lavater was a born hypocrite; and Goethe rightly named him 'from the beginning the friend of Lies, who stooped to the basest flatteries to gain influence.' To this flattering cringing softness he united the spirit of priestly domination. His first works made a great sensation. In 1769 he translated Bonnet's Palingénésie, adding notes in a strain of religious sentimentalism then very acceptable. At a time when the critics were rehabilitating Homer and the early singers, it was natural that the religious world should attempt a restoration of the early Apostolic spirit. At a time when belief in poetic inspiration was a first article of the creed, belief in prophetic inspiration found eager followers. I have already touched on the sentimental extravagance of the time; and for those whom a reasonable repugnance will keep from Lavater's letters and writings, one sentence may be quoted sufficiently significant. To the lovely Countess Branconi he wrote: 'O toi chéri pour la vie, l'âme de mon âme! Ton mouchoir, tes cheveux, sont pour moi ce que mes jarrettières sont pour toi!' &c., which from a priest to a married woman is somewhat unctuous, but which is surpassed by what he allowed to be addressed by an admirer to himself,

* See Gessner's Biographie Lavaters.

e. g. : ‘Oh that I could lie on thy breast in Sabbath holy evening stillness — oh thou angel!’ One sees that this rhodomontade went all round. They wept, and were wept on.

At the time of his arrival in Frankfurt, Lavater was in the first flush of renown. Goethe was peculiarly attracted to him, not only by the singularity of his character, but by a certain community of religious sentiment. Community of creed there was not, and could not be. What Goethe felt we may gather from his attachment to Fräulein von Klettenberg; what he thought may be seen in such letters as this to Pfenninger, a friend of Lavater’s: ‘Believe me, dear brother, the time will come when we shall understand each other. You talk to me as a sceptic, who wishes to understand — to have all demonstrated — who has had no experience. The contrary of all this is the fact. Am I not more resigned in matters of Understanding and Demonstration than you are? I am, perhaps, a fool to express myself in your language to please you. I ought, by a purely experimental psychology, to place my inmost being before you to show that I am a man, and hence can only feel as other men feel, and that all which appears contradiction between us is only dispute about words, arising from my inability to feel things under other combinations than those actually felt by me, and hence, in expressing their relation to me, I name them differently, which has been the eternal source of controversy, and will for ever remain so. And yet you always want to oppress me with evidences. Wherefore? Do I need evidence of my own existence? Evidence that I feel? I only treasure, love, and demand evidences which convince me that thousands (or even one) have felt before me that which strengthens and invigorates me. And thus to me the word of man becomes like unto the word of God. With my whole soul, I throw myself upon the neck of my brother : Moses, Prophet, Evangelist, Apostle, Spinoza, or Machiavelli ! To each, however, I would say : Dear friend, it is with you as it is with me. Certain details you apprehend clearly and powerfully, but the whole can no more be conceived by you than by me.'

He names Spinoza in this very remarkable passage ; and the whole letter seems like a reproduction of the passage in the Ethics, where that great thinker, anticipating modern psychology, shows [ that each person judges of things according to the disposition of his brain, or rather accepts the affections of his imagination as real things. ) It is no wonder therefore (as we may note in passing) that so many controversies have arisen among men, and that these controversies have at last given birth to scepticism. For although human bodies are alike in many things, there are more in which they differ, and thus what to one appears good, to another appears evil ; what to one appears order, to another appears confusion ; what to one is pleasant, to another is unpleasant.' *

It is unnecessary to interrupt the narrative here by more closely scrutinizing his studies of Spinoza ; enough, if the foregoing citation have made present to our minds the probable parentage of Goethe's opinions. The contrast between Lavater's Christianity and the Christianity of * Ethices : Pars i. Append. The Latin of this passage is so energetic, that it must here be given : 'Quæ omnia satis ostendunt, unumquemque pro dispositione cerebri de rebus judicasse, vel potius imaginationis affectiones pro rebus accepisse. Quare non mirum est (ut hoc etiam obiter notemus) quod inter homines tot, quot experimur, controversiæ ortæ sint ex quibus tandem Scepticismus. Nam quamvis humana corpora in multis conveniunt, in plurimis tamen discrepant, et ideo id quod uni bonum alteri malum videtur ; quod uni ordinatum, alteri confusum ; quod uni gratum, alteri ingratum est.'

Fräulein von Klettenberg interested him, and gave him matter for thought. He agreed somewhat with both, but he agreed perfectly with neither. The difference between Faith and Knowledge he thus reconciled: 'In Faith everything depends on the fact of believing; what we believe is quite secondary. Faith is a profound sense of security, springing from confidence in the All-powerful, Inscrutable Being. The strength of this confidence is the main point. But what we think of this Being depends on other faculties, or even on other circumstances, and is altogether indifferent. Faith is a holy vessel, into which every man may pour his feelings, his understanding and his imagination, as entirely as he can. Knowledge is the antipode of Faith. Therein the point is not whether we know, but what we know, how much we know and how well we know it. Hence men may dispute about knowledge, because it can be widened, corrected; but not about Faith.'

So strong was the attraction of Lavater's society that Goethe accompanied him to Ems. The journey was charming; beautiful summer weather, and Lavater's cheerful gayety, formed pleasant accompaniments to their religious discussions. On returning to Frankfurt, another and very different celebrity was there to distract his attention — Basedow, the education reformer. No greater contrast to Lavater could have been picked out of the celebrities of that day. Lavater was handsome, clean, cheerful, flattering, insinuating, devout; Basedow ugly, dirty among the dirty, sarcastic, domineering, and aggressively heterodox. One tried to restore Apostolic Christianity, the other could not restrain the most insolent sarcasms on the Bible, the Trinity, and every form of Christian creed. One set up as a Prophet, the other as a Teacher.

Basedow (born 1723) was also early in indicating his future part. At school the wild and dirty boy manifested rebellious energy against all system and all method; studied in a desultory, omnivorous manner, as if to fit himself for everything; ran away from home and became a lackey in a nobleman's house; caught up Rousseau's doctrine about a state of nature, which he applied to Education; wrote endless works, or rather incessant repetitions of one work; shouted with such lusty lungs that men could not but hear him; appealed to the nation for support in his philanthropic schemes; collected 'a rent' from philanthropists and dupes; attacked established institutions, and parenthetically all Christian tenets; and proved himself a man of restless energy and of vast and comprehensive ignorance. He made considerable noise in the world; and in private lived somewhat the life of a restless hog who has taken to philanthropy and freethinking.

Much as such a character was opposed to his own, Goethe, eager and inquiring, felt an attraction towards it as a character to study. Like many other studies, this had its drawbacks. He was forced to endure the incessant smoking and incessant sarcasms of the dirty educationist. The stench he endured with firmness; the anti-Christian tirades he answered with paradoxies wilder than any he opposed. 'Such a splendid opportunity of exercising, if not of elevating, my mind,' he says, 'was not to be thrown away; so prevailing on my father and friends to undertake my law business, I once more set off for the Rhine in Basedow's company.' Basedow filled the carriage with smoke, and killed the time with discussions. On the way they fell in with Lavater, and the three visited several chateaux, especially of those of noble ladies, everywhere anxious to receive the literary Lions.

Goethe, we may parenthetically note, is in error when he says that he was on this voyage greatly pestered by the women wanting to know 'all about' the truth of Werther; the fact being that Werther did not appear until the following October; for although the exigencies of my narrative have caused a certain anticipation in chronology, this journey with Lavater and Basedow, here following the publication of Werther, came before it in Goethe's life. If we are not to believe that the women crowded round him with questions about Lotte, we can readily believe the children crowded round him, begging him to tell them 'stories.'

Wild and 'genius-like' was his demeanor. 'Basedow and I,' he says, 'seemed to be ambitious of proving who could behave the most outrageously.' Very characteristic is the glimpse we catch of him quitting the ball-room, after a heating dance, and rushing up to Basedow's room. The Philanthropist did not go to bed. He threw himself in his clothes upon the bed, and there, in a room full of tobacco smoke and bad air, dictated to his scribe. When fatigue overcame him, he slept awhile, his scribe remaining there, pen in hand, awaiting the awakening of the Philanthropist, who, on opening his eyes, at once resumed the flow of his dictation. Into such a room sprang the dance-heated youth, began a fierce discussion on some problem previously mooted between them, hurried off again to look into the eyes of some charming partner, and before the door closed, heard Basedow recommence dictating.

This union of philosophy with amusement, of restless theorizing with animal spirits, indicates the tone of his mind. 'I am contented,' he said to Lavater, 'I am happy. That I feel; and yet the whole centre of my joy is an overflowing yearning towards something which I have not, something which my soul perceives dimly.' He could reach that 'something' neither through the pious preaching of Lavater, nor through the aggressive preaching of Basedow. Very graphic and ludicrous is the picture he gives of his sitting like a citizen of the world between a prophet on the right and a prophet on the left hand —

Prophete rechts, Prophete links, Das Welt-Kind in der Mitte, — quietly eating a chicken while Lavater explains to a country parson the mystery of the Revelations, and Basedow astonishes a dancing-master with a scornful exposure of the inutility of baptism.*

Nor could he find this 'something' in Jacobi, with whom he now came into friendly, nay, passionate relation. He could to some extent sympathize with Jacobi's sentimental cravings, and philosophic and religious aspirations, for he was bitten with the Wertherism of the epoch. He could gaze with him in uneasy ecstasy upon the moonlight, quivering on the silent Rhine, and pour forth the songs which were murmuring within his breast. He could form a friendship, believing it to rest upon an eternal basis of perfect sympathy; but the inward goad which drove him onwards and onwards was not to be eradicated until fresh experience had brought about fresh metamorphoses in his development. It is the Youth we have before us here, the Youth in his titantic struggles and many-wandering aims, not the Man grown into clearness.

Jacobi thought that in Goethe he had at length found the man his heart needed, whose influence could sustain and direct him. 'The more I consider it,' he wrote to Wieland, 'the more intensely do I feel how impossible it is for one who has not seen and heard Goethe, to write a word about this extraordinary creation of God's. One needs be with him but an hour to see that it is utterly absurd to expect him to think and act otherwise than as he does. I do not mean that there is no possibility of an improvement in him; but nothing else is possible with his nature, which develops itself as the flower does, as the seed ripens, as the tree grows into the air and crowns itself.'

* See the poem Diné zu Coblentz.

Goethe's wonderful personality seems almost everywhere to produce a similar impression. Heinse, the author of Ardinghello, writes of him at this period to Gleim: 'Goethe was with us, a beautiful youth of five-and-twenty, who is all genius and strength from head to foot, his heart full of feeling, his soul full of fire and eagle-winged; I know no man in the whole History of Literature who at such an age can be compared to him in fulness and completeness of genius.' Those, and they are the mass, who think of him as the calm and stately minister, the old Jupiter throned in Weimar, will feel some difficulty perhaps in recognizing the young Apollo of this period. But it must be remembered that not only was he young, impetuous, bursting into life, and trying his eagle wings with wanton confidence of strength; he was, moreover, a Rhinelander, with the gay blood of that race stimulated by the light and generous wine of the Rhine — not a Northern muddled with beer. When I contrast young Goethe with a Herder, for example, it is always as if a flask of Rhenish glittered before me, beside a schoppen of Bavarian beer.

Such answer to his aspirations as the youth could at this period receive, he found in Spinoza. In his father's library there was a little book written against Spinoza, one of the many foolish 'refutations' which that grand old Hebrew's misunderstood system called forth. 'It made little impression on me, for I hated controversies, and always wanted to know what a thinker thought, and not what another conceived he ought to have thought.' It made him, however, once more read the article Spinoza, in Bayle's Dictionary, which he found pitiable — as indeed it is. If a philosophy is to be judged by its fruits, the philosophy which guided so great and so virtuous a life as that of Spinoza, could not, Goethe thought, deserve the howls of execration which followed Spinozism. He procured the Opera Posthuma and studied them; with what fruit let the following confession indicate. He is speaking of his new friendship with Jacobi: 'The thoughts which Jacobi imparted to me flowed immediately from his heart. How deeply was I moved when in unlimited confidence he revealed to me the deepest wants and aspirations of his soul. From so amazing a combination of mental wants, passion and ideas, I could only gather presentiment of what might perhaps hereafter grow clearer to me. Fortunately, my mind had already been prepared, if not thoroughly cultivated in this direction, having in some degree appropriated the results and style of thought of an extraordinary man, and though my study had been incomplete and hasty, I was yet already conscious of important influences derived from this source. This man, who had wrought so powerfully on me, and who was destined to affect so deeply my entire mode of thinking, was Spinoza. After looking around the world in vain for the means of developing my strange nature, I met with the Ethics of that philosopher. Of what I read in the work, and of what I read into it, I can give no account, but I found in it a sedative for my passions, and it seemed to unveil a clear, broad view over the material and moral world. But what especially riveted me to him, was the boundless disinterestedness which shone forth in every sentence. That wonderful sentiment, 'He who truly loves

✕ God must not require God to love him in return, together with all the preliminary propositions on which it rests, and all the consequences deduced from it, filled my mind.* To be disinterested in everything, but most of all in love and friendship, was my highest desire, my maxim, my practice, so that that subsequent hasty saying, 'If I love thee, what is that to thee?' was spoken right out of my heart. Moreover, it must not be forgotten here, that the closest unions rest on contrasts. The all-equalizing calmness of Spinoza was in striking contrast with my all-disturbing activity; his mathematical method was the direct opposite of my poetic style of thought and feeling, and that very precision which was thought ill-adapted to moral subjects made me his enthusiastic disciple, his most decided worshipper. Mind and heart, understanding and sense, sought each other with eager affinity, binding together the most different natures. But now all within was fermenting and seething in action and reaction. Fritz Jacobi, the first whom I suffered to look into the chaos, and whose nature was also toiling in its own unfathomable depths, heartily responded to my confidence, and endeavored to convert me to his own opinions. He, too, felt an unspeakable spiritual want; he, too, would not have it appeased by outward aid, but aimed at development and illumination from within. I could not comprehend what he communicated to me of the state of his mind; the less, indeed, as I could form no adequate conception of my own. Still, being far in advance of me in philosophical thought, and even in the study of Spinoza, he was able to guide and enlighten my efforts.'

Although he studied Spinoza much and reverently, he never studied him systematically. The mathematical form into which that thinker casts his granite blocks of thought, was an almost insuperable hindrance to systematic study on the part of one so impatient, so desultory, and so unmathematical as Goethe. But a study may be very fruitful which is by no means systematic ; a phrase may fructify when falling on a proper soil. It has doubtless happened to the reader in his youth to meet with some entirely novel and profoundly-suggestive idea, casually-cited from an ancient author, and he will remember the overmastering influence it exercised, the longing it awakened for a nearer acquaintance with that author. It was the casual citation of a passage from Spinoza which made my youth restless, and to this day I remember the aspect of the page where it appeared, and the revolution in thought which it effected.* A few ideas determined the direction of Goethe's mind. Although he did not study the system of Spinoza with any view of adopting it as a system, he studied it to draw therefrom food which his own mind could assimilate and work into new forms. Spinoza was to him what Kant was to Schiller ; but, with the characteristic difference of the two minds, Schiller studied systematically, and tried systematically, to reproduce what he had studied.

* The proposition to which Goethe refers is doubtless the xix of Book v.: 'Qui Deum amat, conari non potest, ut Deus ipsum contra amet.'

Side by side with Spinozism, we have to note his dim struggles to gain clearness respecting Christianity. The influence of Fräulein von Klettenberg attracted him to the Moravians, who seemed to realize early Christianity ; with his usual impressionability he studied their history and their doctrines, and gave them some hopes that he would become a convert ; but his enthusiasm cooled down when he discovered the wide chasm that separated him from them. 'That which separated me from this brotherhood,' he says, 'as well as from many other worthy Christians, was the very point which has more than once torn the Church with dissent. One party maintained that by the Fall, human nature had been so corrupted to its inmost core, that not a trace of good could be found in it; and that, therefore, man must renounce all trust in his own powers, and look only to the effect of grace. The opposite party, admitting the hereditary imperfections of man, ascribed to nature a certain internal germ of good which, animated by divine grace, was capable of growing up into a joyous tree of spiritual happiness. This latter conviction penetrated to the depths of my soul all the time that I was, with tongue and pen, maintaining the opposite doctrine. But I had groped so in the twilight (ich dämmerte so hin) that I had never clearly stated the dilemma to myself.'

* It may interest some readers to learn, that Spinoza will ere long appear in English, edited by the writer of these lines.

In spite of all his differences, however, with this sect or that sect, nothing, as he says, could rob him of his love of the Holy Scriptures and the Founder of Christianity. He therefore wrought out for his own private use a Christianity of his own; and as everything which took possession of his soul always assumed a poetic form, he now conceived the idea of treating epically the history of the Wandering Jew. 'The legend ran that in Jerusalem there was a shoemaker named Ahazuerus. The shoemaker whom I had known in Dresden supplied me with the main features of this character; and I animated them with the spirit and humor of an artisan of the school of Hans Sachs, ennobling him by a great love for Christ. In his open workshop he talked with the passers-by, and jested with them after the Socratic fashion; so that the people took pleasure in lingering at his booth. Even the Pharisees and the Sadducees spoke to him; and our Saviour himself, and his disciples, often stopped before his door. The shoemaker, whose thoughts were altogether worldly, I nevertheless depicted as feeling a special affection for our Lord, which chiefly showed itself in a desire to convert this great man, whose mind he did not comprehend, to his own way of thinking. He therefore gravely incited Christ to abandon contemplation, to cease wandering through the country with such idlers, and drawing the people away from their work into the desert ; because an assembled multitude, he said, was always excitable, and no good could come of such a life. Our Lord endeavored by parables to instruct him in his higher views, but they were all thrown away on the rough shoemaker. As Christ grew into greater importance, and became a public character, the well-meaning workman pronounced his opinion still more sharply and angrily, declaring that nothing but disorder and tumult could result from such proceedings, and that Christ would at length be compelled to place himself at the head of a party, which certainly was not his design. And now when these consequences had ensued, Christ having been seized and condemned, Ahazuerus gives full vent to his indignation, as Judas, who in appearance had betrayed our Lord, enters the workshop in despair, with loud lamentations, telling of the frustration of his plan. He had been, no less than the shrewdest of the other disciples, thoroughly persuaded that Christ would declare himself Regent and Chief of the people, and thought by this violence to compel him, whose hesitation had hitherto been invincible, to hasten the declaration.* In this persuasion he had roused the priesthood to

* This new light thrown upon that strange history, though adverse from all tradition, is in strict accordance with our knowledge of human nature. It has been adopted by Archbishop Whately, to an act from which they had hitherto shrunk. The disciples, on their side, were not unarmed; and probably all would have gone well, had not our Lord given himself up, and left them in the most helpless condition. Ahazuerus, by no means propitiated by this narrative, embitters the state of the wretched ex-apostle, who has no resource left but to hang himself. As our Saviour is led past the workshop of the shoemaker, on his road to execution, the well-known scene of the legend occurs. The sufferer faints under the burden of the cross, which Simon of Cyrene undertakes to carry. At this moment Ahazuerus steps forward; and, in the style of those harsh common-sense people who, seeing a man miserable through his own fault, feel no compassion, but rather, in their ill-timed justice, make the matter worse by reproaches, repeats all his former warnings, which he now turns into vehement accusations, springing, as it were, from his very love for the sufferer. Our Saviour answers not, but at that instant Veronica covers his face with a napkin, and there, as she removes it and raises it aloft, Ahazureus sees depicted the features of our Lord, not in their present agony, but radiant with celestial life. Astounded at the sight, he turns away his eyes, and hears the words, "Over the earth shalt thou wander till thou shalt once more see me in this form." Overwhelmed by the sentence, he is some time before he recovers himself; he then finds that every one has gone to the place of execution, and that the streets of Jerusalem are empty. Unrest and yearnings drive him forth, and his wanderings begin.'

This legendary conception he never executed. It lived within him for a long while, and during his travels in whom, indeed, it is generally attributed; and has furnished the subject of a miracle-play to R. H. Horne. See his Judas Iscariot.

Italy, he again thought of taking it up ; but, like so many other plans, it remained a mere scheme, from the want of some external stimulus urging him to give it shape.

Another subject also worthy of elaborate treatment is thus mentioned by him : ‘ The common burthen of humanity which we have all to bear falls most heavily on those whose intellectual powers expand early. We may grow up under the protection of parents, we may lean for a while upon our brothers and friends, be amused by acquaintances, rendered happy by those we love, but in the end man is always driven back upon himself ; and it seems as if the Divinity had so placed himself in relation to man as not always to respond to his reverence, trust, and love, at least not in the terrible moment of need. Early and often enough had I learned that the call to us is, “ Physician, heal thyself ; ” and how frequently had I been compelled to exclaim in my pain, “ I tread the wine-press alone ! ” So now, looking round for support to my self-dependence, I felt that the surest basis on which to build was my own productive activity. For many years I had never known it fail me. What I had seen by day often shaped itself into magnificent dreams at night. My time for writing was early in the morning ; but in the evening, or deep in the night, when wine and social intercourse had elevated my spirits, you might demand whatever you wanted ; only let a subject with some character in it be proposed, and I was at once prepared and ready. In reflecting on this natural gift, I saw that it belonged to me as my own, and could neither be fostered nor hindered by any external circumstances ; so I sought to make it the basis of my whole existence. This notion transformed itself into an image. The old mythological figure of Prometheus occurred to me ; who, severed from the gods, peopled the world from his own workshop. I clearly felt that nothing important could be produced without self-isolation. My productions had been the children of solitude; and since I had formed wider relations with the world there had been no want of power or of pleasure of invention, but the execution halted, because I had neither in prose nor in verse, what could properly be called a style of my own, and thus with every new work had to begin at the beginning, and make experiments. As in this I had to exclude all aid from men, so, after the fashion of Prometheus, I separated myself from the gods also; and this the more naturally as, with my mode of thinking, one tendency always swallowed up and repelled every other.

‘The fable of Prometheus lived within me. The old Titan web I cut up according to my own stature, and began to write a play expressing the incongruous relation in which Prometheus stood with respect to Jupiter and the later gods, in consequence of his making men with his own hand, giving them life by the aid of Minerva, and thus founding a third dynasty. To this strange composition belongs the monologue which has become famous in German literature, because it called forth a declaration from Lessing against Jacobi on certain important matters of doctrine.’*

Of this Prometheus we possess but a fragment, but the fragment is of such excellence as to make us regret that it never was completed. It lies there among his works, a fragment like the torso of the Theseus, enough to prove the greatness of the artist, if not enough to satisfy the spectator. Grand in conception, simple in style, luminous with great thoughts, it would have been an exemplar of the adaptation of an antique symbol to modern meanings, not the idle imitation of a bygone creed.

*He alludes to the discussion on Spinoza between Jacobi and Lessing, which gave rise to Jacobi’s very feeble book, Ueber die Lehre des Spinozas, which made a great noise in its day.

Nothing can be more unlike Æschylus. The Greek Titan glories in his audacity :

Ἐξων ἔξων ἱμάροτον, οὐκ ἄρνησομαι.

‘Willingly, willingly I did it, never will I deny the deed!’ but while glorying, he complains; the injustice of the tyrant wrings from him cries of pain, cries of physical and cries of moral agony. The whole tragedy is one wild outburst of sorrow. The first words he utters are to fling his clamorous sorrow on the air, calling on the Divine Ether and the swift winged Winds, on the Sea Springs and the multitudinous laughter of the waves, on the Universal Mother, the Earth — and on the all-seeing Eye, the Sun, to witness what he, a god, must suffer. These are his opening words; the closing words carry the same burden. He wails over the pangs that are and are to be : —

Αἰ, αἰ το παρὸν το τ’ ἐπερχόμερον
Πῆμα στεναχῶ.

This is antique. The Titan in Goethe utters no complaint. There is no bravado in his defiance; the defiance is uncompromising and sublime. His contempt for Zeus is founded on his knowledge of the subordination of Zeus to a higher power — Destiny. ‘Away,’ he exclaims, ‘I serve no slave.’

Geh! Ich diene nicht Vasallen!

In this he resembles the glorious Titan drawn by Shelley, in the Prometheus Unbound, who, to Mercury’s warning of the years of coming torture, calmly and grandly answers :

‘Perchance no thought can count them — yet they pass!’

On this conviction rests his self-reliance. He knows the reign of tyranny must end, and he awaits that end.

In Æschylus also, the Titan knows that Zeus must fall; he foresees his own release, and, foreseeing it, resolves to bear his fate as well as he can, 'for it is in vain to struggle against fate.' (v. 105.) Nevertheless, the knowledge of an end, and the philosophy which preaches acquiescence, does not prevent him from complaining. And this is very Greek. Homer makes even Mars, when wounded, howl with pain; and Sophocles has filled the Philoctetes with cries of physical pain. The Greeks had none of our modern notions respecting the effeminacy of complaint.

It may be objected perhaps to the foregoing view of the Titan, that Æschylus has in the first scene made him imperturbably silent, disdaining to answer the taunts of Power and the pity of Vulcan, as they bind him to the rock. These draw from him no groan, no word, no gesture; he has no defiance for the one, nor friendly gratitude for the other. It is not until he is left alone that he appeals to Earth, Air and Ocean. This silence, followed by this passion, produces a sublime effect. But the sublimity was not the poet's intention; it is an accidental effect. The silence was simply a stage-necessity, as I have elsewhere shown. Whether owing to some eurhythmic tendency in the construction of Greek plays, as Gruppe,* and after him Bode,† have maintained; or, more probably, from motives of economy with respect to the actors, as Geppert asserts;‡ certain it is that in the plays of Æschylus more than two speakers were never together on the stage, with one trivial exception in the **Ariadne: oder die Tragische Kunst der Griechen*, p. 143.

†Geschichte der Hellen, Dichtkunst, iii. p. 233.

‡Alt-Griechische Bühne, p. 58.

Choëphoræ, where Pylades says a few words. Hence scholars have been puzzled to account for the distribution of the Prometheus into parts. In the first scene the protagonist would take Power and the deuteragonist Vulcan. Prometheus therefore must be silent, for there is no one to speak for him. Here comes the difficulty : If Prometheus is necessarily silent during the prologue, how does he become eloquent immediately on being left alone ? Welcker* supposes that Prometheus was represented by a picture, and the protagonist at the close of the prologue got behind it, and spoke through it ; an explanation accepted by Hermann,† but shown by Schömann‡ to be full of difficulties. Let that point be settled as it may, the fact remains that the silence of Prometheus was forced by stage necessities, and was not meant as an indication of his self-reliance ; the further proof of which is to be seen in his wailings and writhings throughout the play — notably in the scene with Mercury (v. 905), where Prometheus is scurrilously fluent.

Shelley never makes his Titan flinch. He stands there as the sublime of endurance :

‘To suffer woes which Hope thinks infinite ;
To forgive wrongs darker than death or night ;
To defy power which seems omnipotent ;
To love and bear ; to hope till Hope creates
From its own wreck the thing it contemplates ;
Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent.’

This is grand ; but grander far the conception of Goethe, whose Titan knows that he is a god, and that if he be true to himself, no power can trouble or destroy his heritage of life and activity :

* Opusc. ii. p. 146.    † Trilogie, p. 30.    ‡ Prometheus, p. 85.

Das was ich habe können sie nicht rauben,
 Und was sie haben mögen sie beschützen ;
 Hier Mein und Dein,
 Und so sind wir geschieden.

EPINETHEUS.

Wie vieles ist denn Dein ?

PROMETHEUS.

Der Kreis den meine Wirksamkeit erfüllt.*

This is a profound truth strikingly brought out. Godlike energy is seen only in creation ; what we can do we are ; our strength is measured by our plastic power. Thus the contempt of Prometheus for the idleness, the uncreativity of the gods is both deep and constant.

Curtain thy heavens, Zeus,
 With clouds, with mist !
 And, like a boy that crushes thistle-tops,
 Loosen thy rage on oaks and mountain ridges.
 Yet must thou leave
 Me my earth standing ;
 My hut, which myself built ;
 My hearth, with its bright flame,
 Which thou dost envy.
 I know nought so pitiful
 Under the sun as ye gods !
 Scantly nourishing
 With the forced offerings
 Of tremulous prayer
 Your divinity !
 Children and beggars,

---

* That which I have they cannot rob me of ; that which they have, let them guard. Here mine, here thine ; and thus are we distinguished.

EPIMETHEUS.

What, then, is thine ?

PROMETHEUS.

The circle my activity doth fill !

And fools hope-deluded,
Keep ye from starving !
Who gave me succor
From the fierce Titans !
Who rescued me
From Slavery !
Thou ! thou, my soul, glowing With holiest fire !
Yet didst thou, credulous,
Pour forth thy thanks to him
Who slumbers above !

I reverence thee ? Wherefore ?
Hast lightened the woes
Of the heavily laden ?
Hast thou dried the tears
Of the troubled in spirit ?
Who fashioned me man ?
Was it not almighty Time —
And Fate eternal,
Thy lords and mine ?

Here I sit and shape
Man in my image :
A race like myself,
That will suffer and weep,
Will rejoice and enjoy,
And scorn thee,
As I !

Even in this rough plaster-cast of translation, does not the grandeur and beauty of the original shine through ?

CHAPTER IX.

LILI.

‘I MUST tell you something which makes me happy ; and that is the visit of many excellent men of all grades, and from all parts, who, among unimportant and intolerable visitors, call on me often, and stay some time. We first know that we exist, when we recognize ourselves in others (man weiss erst dass man ist, wenn man sich in andern wiederfindet).’ It is thus he writes to the Countess Augusta von Stolberg, with whom he had formed, through correspondence, one of those romantic friendships which celebrated men, some time in their lives, are generally led to form. This correspondence is among the most characteristic evidences we have of his mental condition, and should be read by every one who wishes to correct the tone of the Autobiography. Above all, it is the repository of his fluctuating feelings respecting Lili, the woman whom, according to his statement to Eckermann, he loved more than any other. ‘She was the first, and I can also add she is the last, I truly loved ; for all the inclinations which have since agitated my heart, were superficial and trivial in comparison.’* There is no statement he has made respecting a matter of feeling, to which I should oppose a flatter contradiction. Indeed we find it difficult to believe he uttered such a sentence, unless we remember how carelessly in conversation such retrospective statements are made, and how, at his very advanced age, the memory of youthful feelings must have come back upon him with peculiar tenderness. Whatever caused him to make that statement, the statement is very questionable. I do not see that he loved Lili more than Frederika ; and we shall hereafter have positive evidence that his love for the Frau von Stein, and for his wife, was of a much deeper and more enduring nature. ‘My love for Lili,’ he said to Eckermann, ‘had something so peculiar and delicate that even now it has influenced my style in the narrative of that painfully-happy epoch. When you read the fourth volume of my Autobiography, you will see that my love was something quite different from love in novels.’

* Gespräche, iii. p. 299.

Well, the fourth volume is now open to every one, and he must have peculiar powers of divination who can read any profound passion in the narrative. A colder love-history was never written by a poet. There is no emotion warming his style, and irradiating the narrative ; there is little of a loving recollection, gathering all details into one continuous story ; it is, indeed, with great difficulty one unravels the story at all. He seems to seize every excuse to interrupt the narrative by general reflections, or by sketches of other people. He speaks of himself as ‘the youth of whom we now write !’ He speaks of her and her circle in the vaguest manner ; and the feelings which agitated him we must ‘read between the lines.’

It is very true, however, that the love there depicted is unlike the love depicted in novels. In novels, whatever may be the amount of foolishness with which the writers adumbrate their ideal of the passion, this truth, at least, is everywhere set forth, that to love we must render up body and soul, heart and mind, all interests and all desires, all prudences and all ambitions, identifying our being with that of another, in union to become elevated. To love is for the Soul to choose a companion, and travel with it along the perilous defiles and winding ways of life; mutually sustaining, when the path is terrible with abysses, mutually exhorting, when it is rugged with obstructions, and mutually rejoicing, when rich broad plains and sunny slopes make journeying delight, showing in the quiet Distance the resting-place we all seek in this world.

It was not such companionship he sought with Lili, it was not such self-devotion which made him restlessly happy in her love. While this child of sixteen, in all the merciless grace of maidenhood, proudly conscious of her power, ensnared his roving heart through the lures of passionate desire, she never touched his soul, as the story we have to tell will sufficiently prove.

Anna Elizabeth Schöнемann, immortalized as Lili, was the daughter of a great banker in Frankfurt, who lived in the splendid style of merchant princes. She was sixteen when Goethe first fell in love with her. The age is significant. It was somewhat the age of Frederika, Lotte, Anna, Sybilla and Maximiliane, — an age when girlhood has charms of grace and person, of beauty and freshness, which even those will not deny who profoundly feel the superiority of a developed woman. There is poetry in this age; but there is no depth, no fulness of character. Imagine the wide-sweeping mind of the author of Götz, Faust, Prometheus, The Wandering Jew, Mahomet, in companionship with the mind of a girl of sixteen!

Nor was Lili an exceptional character. Young, graceful, and charming, she was confessedly a coquette. Early in their acquaintance, in one of those pleasant hours of overflowing egotism wherein lovers take pride in the confession of faults (not without intimation also of nobler qualities), Lili told him the story of her life ; told him what a flirt she had been ; told him, moreover, that she had tried her spells on him, and was punished by being herself ensnared. Armida found herself spell-bound by Rinaldo, but Rinaldo followed her into the enchanted gardens more out of adventurous curiosity than love.

There was considerable difference in their stations ; and the elegant society of the banker's house was every way discordant to the wild youth, whose thoughts were of Nature and unconstrained freedom. The balls and concerts to which he followed her were little to his taste. 'If,' he writes to Augusta von Stolberg, 'If you can imagine a Goethe in braided coat, from head to foot in the gallantest costume, amid the glare of chandeliers, fastened to the card table by a pair of bright eyes, surrounded by all sorts of people, driven in endless dissipation from concert to ball, and with frivolous interest making love to a pretty blonde, then will you have a picture of the present Carnival-Goethe.' In the following poem he expresses Lili's fascination and his uneasiness ; the translation aims at accuracy of meaning rather than poetry, because the meaning is here the motive for my citing the poem :

Wherefore so resistlessly dost draw me
Into scenes so bright ?
Had I not enough to soothe and charm me
In the lonely night ?

Homely in my little room secluded,
While the moon's bright beams
In a shimmering light fell softly on me,
As I lay in dreams.

Dreaming thro' the golden hours of rapture
Soothed my heart to rest,
As I felt thy image sweetly living
Deep within my breast.

Can it be I sit at yonder table,
Gay with cards and lights,
Forced to meet intolerable people,
Because 'tis she invites?

Alas ! the gentle bloom of spring no longer
Cheereth my poor heart,
There is only spring, and love, and nature,
Angel, where thou art !

The real Goethe is thus drawn in contrast by himself in his letter to Augusta. 'But there is another, who in gray beaver coat, with boots, and a brown silk neckerchief, who, ever living in himself, working and striving, now throwing the innocent feelings of youth into little poems, now the strong spices of life into dramas, sketching his friends in chalk, asking neither right nor left what will be thought of his doings, because he always rises through work a step higher, because he springs at no Ideal, but lets his nature develope itself fighting and playing.' Here the true chord vibrates. Born for poetry, and not to pass his life in ball-rooms dangling after a pretty blonde who coquetted with him and with others, he feels that his passion is a folly. Now when a man feels that — 'Cupid may have tapped him on the shoulder, but I warrant him heart whole.' Read this poem, and read in it the struggle :

Heart, my heart, what is this feeling,
That doth weigh on thee so sore ?
What new life art thou revealing,
That I know myself no more ?
Gone is all that once was dearest,
Gone the care that once was nearest,

Gone the labor, gone the bliss,
Ah ! whence comes such change as this ?

Art thou spell-bound by the beauty
Of a sweetly blooming face ;
Beauteous shape, and look so truthful,
And an all-resistless grace ?
When the bonds I strive to sever,
Man myself to flee forever,
Vain are all my efforts, vain !
And but lead me back again.

With such magic-web she binds me,
To burst through I have no skill ;
All-absorbing passion blinds me,
Paralyzes my poor will.
In her charmèd sphere delaying,
I must live, her will obeying ;
Great, oh ! great to me the change !
Love, oh ! free me ! let me range ! *

Lili coquetted, and her coquetry seems to have cooled his passion for a while, though she knew how to rekindle it. She served him as he served poor Käthchen, in Leipsic ; and as in Leipsic he dramatized his experience under the form of Die Laune des Verliebten, so here he dramatizes the new experience in an opera, Erwin und Elmire, wherein the coquetry of a mistress brings a lover to despair — a warning to Lili, which does not seem to have been altogether without effect.

Not only had he to suffer from her thoughtlessness, but also from the thoughtfulness of parents on both sides. It was not a marriage acceptable to either house. The bank-

* No one can be more sensible than I am of the inadequacy of this translation, but the English reader would rather have a poor translation than an original he could not understand, and the German reader has only to turn to the original if it live not in his memory.

er's daughter, it was thought, should marry into some rich or noble family. A poet, who belonged to a well-to-do yet comparatively unimportant family, was not exactly the bridegroom most desired. On the other hand, the proud, stiff old Rath did not greatly rejoice in the prospect of having a fine lady for his daughter-in-law. Cornelia, who knew her father, and knew his pedantic ways, wrote strongly against the marriage. Merck, Crespel, Horn, and other friends, were all decidedly opposed to so incompatible a match. But of course the lovers were only thrown closer together by these attempts to separate them.

A certain Fräulein Delf managed to overcome objections, and gain the consent of both families. 'How she commenced it, how she got over the difficulties I know not, but one evening she came to us bringing the consent. 'Take each other's hands,' she cried in a half pathetic, half imperious manner. I advanced to Lili and held out my hand: in it she placed her's, not indeed reluctantly, yet slowly. With a deep sigh we sank into each other's arms greatly agitated.' No formal betrothal seems to have taken place. Indeed, the consent which was obtained seems in no wise to have altered the feeling of friends and relatives. The nearer marriage seemed, the more impracticable it appeared. To Goethe, after the first flush of joy had subsided, the idea of marriage was in itself enough to make him uneasy, and to sharpen his sense of the disparity in station. The arrival of the two Counts Stolberg, and their proposal that he should accompany them in a tour through Switzerland, gave an excuse for freeing himself from Lili, 'as an experiment to try whether he could renounce her.'

Before accompanying him on this journey, it is necessary to cast a retrospective glance at some biographical details, omitted while the story of Lili was narrated. The mornings were devoted to poetry, the middle of the day to jurisprudence. Poetry was the breathing-room of his heart. In it he sought to escape from the burden of intolerable doubts. ‘If I did not write dramas I should be lost,’ he tells Augusta von Stolberg. Among these dramas we must place Stella, for which, as we learn from a letter to Merck, the publisher offered twenty dollars, — that is to say, three pounds sterling. What an insight this gives into the state of Literature: the author of two most astonishing and popular works is offered three pounds for a drama in five acts! Poor Schiller, subsequently, was glad to write histories and translate memoirs for fifteen or eighteen shillings a sheet of sixteen pages.

In Stella I can trace no biographical element, and perhaps the absence of this element makes the weakness of the drama. A poorer production was never owned by a great poet; although there have not been wanting critics to see in this also the broad handling of a master. It is the old story of the Count von Gleichen and his two wives. Fernando has deserted his wife, and formed an attachment to Stella; but the peculiarity of the situation is, that he quitted Cecilia, his wife, from no assignable cause, without even having outlived his love for her. He has indeed every reason to respect and cherish her as the mother of his child, and as a high principled, virtuous woman; but he flies from her like a coward, flies to one more passionate, because she gives him the transports of passion in exchange for his wife’s calm affection. The two women meet, and discover their love for the same man.

Here is a fine dramatic collision. On the one side Fernando sees Duty in the shape of a noble, suffering wife, and an engaging daughter; on the other, Passion in the shape of a fascinating mistress. But with this suggestive subject Goethe has done little. He shows us the contemptible weakness of the wavering Fernando, but the subject he has not powerfully wrought out. As I cannot recommend any one to read this play, the two masterly touches it contains may here be cited. The following is delicately observed.

We women believe in men! In the ardor of passion they deceive themselves, how then can we help being deceived by them?

This also is charming: Fernando returns to Stella after a long absence, and in their endearments she says:

Stella. How we love you! We do not think of the grief you cause us!

Fernando (stroking her hair). And has the grief made your hair gray? It is fortunate your hair is so golden . . . nay, none seems to have fallen out! (Takes the comb from her hair, which falls on her shoulders. He then twines the hair round his arm, exclaiming:) Rinaldo once more in the ancient chains!

Artists complain of the dearth of subjects, will no one try his hand at that? Originally the dénouement of this 'Play for Lovers' (as it was called) solved the difficulty by a romantic piece of bigamy. Fernando is about to fly with Cecilia, — about to return to his duty, when his wife — compassionating the situation of Stella, if Fernando should leave her — resolves to sacrifice her conjugal claims, and to share him with Stella! The curtain falls as he embraces them both, exclaiming, 'Mine! mine!'

This roused vehement opposition. It was said to be a plaidoyer in favor of bigamy. The public dimly felt that instead of being a proper solution of the problem, that was on the whole rather ridiculous. Still more unsatisfactory, however, if deeply considered, is the dénouement which was added when the play was produced at Weimar, and which now takes the place of the original in his collected works. Therein Fernando, unable to quit Stella, and unable to quit his wife, weeps with both, and blows his brains out. This is an evasion of the difficulty, not a solution.

In 1798, a feeble translation of Stella was published in England, and suggested to Canning his admirable caricature, The Rovers, familiar to all readers of the Anti-jacobin. Among the ludicrous passages of this parody is the famous vow of friendship :

‘Matilda. A sudden thought strikes me. Let us swear an eternal friendship.

‘Cecilia. Let us agree to live together.’

But this is really a very slight variation from the original :

Stella. Madame ! Da fährt mir ein Gedanke durch den Kopf — Wir wollen einander das seyn, was sie uns hätten werden sollen ! Wir wollen beisammen bleiben ! — Ihre hand ! — Von diesen Augenblick an, lass’ ich Sie nicht !

Besides Stella, he seems to have worked at Faust, and to have written the opera of Claudine von Villa Bella, several passages for Lavater’s Physiognomy, and many smaller poems.

The Stolbergs, with whom the Swiss journey was made, were two ardent admirers of Klopstock, and two specimens of the defiant ‘genius’ class which scorned convention. They hated imaginary tyrants, outraged sober citizens by their reckless recurrence to a supposed ‘state of nature,’ and astonished sensible citizens by their exaggerated notions of friendship. Merck was pitiless in his sarcasms and warnings. He could not tolerate the idea of Goethe’s travelling with these Burschen. But Goethe had too much of kindred devilry in him, breaking out at moments, to object to the wildness of his companions, though he began to suspect all was not right when, after violating every other convenance, they insisted on bathing in public. 'Nature' having nothing to say against naked youths in the bright sunshine, what business had old Humdrum to cover its eyes with modest hands, and pretend to be shocked? However, so little prepossessed was Humdrum in favor of the Nude, that stones were showered upon these children of Nature; a criticism which effectively modified their practice, if it failed to alter their views.

Drinking the health of Stolberg's mistress, and then dashing the glasses against the wall to prevent their being desecrated by other mouths after so solemn a consecration (a process which looked less heroic when item'd in the bill next day), and otherwise demeaning themselves like true children of 'genius,' they passed a wild and merry time. This journey need not longer detain us. Two visits alone deserve mention. One was to Karl August, who was then in Karlsruhe arranging his marriage with the Princess Luise, and who very pressinglly invited him to Weimar. The other was to his sister Cornelia, who earnestly set before him all the objections to a marriage with Lili. 'I made no promises,' he says, 'although forced to confess that she had convinced me. I left her with that strange feeling in my heart with which passion nourishes itself; for the boy Cupid clings obstinately to the garment of Hope even when she is preparing with long strides to depart.' The image of Lili haunted him amid the lovely scenes of Nature :

Dearest Lili, if I did not love thee,
How transporting were a scene like this !
Yet, my Lili, if I did not love thee,
What were any bliss ?

It was her Image which held him to his native land. His father, always desirous he should see Italy, was now doubly anxious he should go there, as the surest means of a separation from Lili. But 'Lombardy and Italy,' says the poet, 'lay before me a strange land ; while the dear home of Germany lay behind, full of sweet domesticities, and where — let me confess it — she lived who so long had enchained me, in whom my existence was centred. A little golden heart, which in my happiest hours I had received from her, still hung round my neck. I drew it forth and covered it with kisses.'

On his return to Frankfurt he learned that Lili's friends had taken advantage of his absence, to try and bring her to a separation, arguing, not without justice, that his absence was a proof of lukewarmness. But Lili remained firm ; and it was said that she had declared herself willing to go with him to America. A sentence from the Autobiography is worth quoting, as a specimen of that love 'so unlike the love to be found in novels,' which he declared had given a peculiar tone to his narrative. It is in reference to this willingness of Lili to go to America : — 'The very thing which should have animated my hopes depressed them. My fair paternal house, only a few hundred paces from hers, was after all more endurable and attractive than a remote, hazardous spot beyond the seas !' A sentence which recalls Gibbon's antithesis on his resignation of his early love : 'I sighed as a lover, I obeyed as a son.'

He was restless and unhappy during these months, for he was not strong enough to give her up, nor sufficiently in love to marry her ; jealous of those who surrounded her, hurt by her coldness, he was every now and then led captive by her tenderness. There were moments when by-gone days seemed once more restored, and then instantly vanished again like ghosts. His poem of Lili's Managerie expresses his surly disgust at the familiar faces which surround her. The Bear of the menagerie is a portrait of himself.

Turning to Art for consolation, he began the tragedy of Egmont, which he completed, many years afterwards, in Italy. It was a work which demanded more repose than could be found in his present condition. That condition was unhealthy; and I hasten to the dénouement of an episode, which, amid fluctuations of feeling, steadily advanced to an end which must have been foreseen. The betrothal was cancelled. He was once more free. Free, but not happy. His heart still yearned for her, because there lay in his nature a need of loving, rather than because she was the woman fitted to share his life. He lingered about the house o' nights, wrapped in his mantle, satisfied if he could catch a glimpse of her shadow on the blind, as she moved about the room. One night he heard her singing at the piano. His pulses throbbed, as he distinguished his own song:

Wherefore so resistlessly dost draw me
Into scenes so bright? —

the song he had written in the morning of their happiness! Her voice ceased. She rose, and walked up and down the room, little dreaming that her lover was beneath her window, torn by terrible emotions.

To give decision to his wavering feelings there came, most opportunely, a visitor to Frankfurt. This was in September. Karl August, with his bride, on his way to Weimar, once more pressed him to spend a few weeks at his court. The rapid inclination which had sprung up between the Prince and the Poet — the desire to see something of the great world — the desire, moreover, to quit Frankfurt, all combined to make him eagerly accept the invitation. His father, indeed, tried to dissuade him; partly because he liked not the intercourse of plain citizens with princes, partly because the recent experience of Voltaire with Frederick the Great seemed to point to an inevitable termination in disgrace, if not evaded by servility. His consent was extorted at last, however, and Goethe quitted forever the paternal roof.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

THE GENIALISCH-PERIOD IN WEIMAR.

---

1775 to 1779.

---

‘ Quis novus hic nostris successit sedibus hospes ?
Quem sese ore ferens ! quam forti pectore et armis !
Credo equidem, nec vana fides, genus esse Deorum.’

Virgil.

‘ Tolle Zeiten hab' ich erlebt und hab' nicht ermangelt, Selbst auch thöricht zu sein wie es die Zeit mir gebot.’

BOOK THE FOURTH.

---

CHAPTER I.

WEIMAR IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

ON the 7th of November, 1775, Goethe, aged twenty-six, arrived at the little city on the banks of the Ilm, where his long residence was to confer on an insignificant Duchy the immortal renown of a German Athens.

Small indeed is the space occupied on the map by the Duchy of Saxe-Weimar; yet the historian of the German Courts declares, and truly, that after Berlin there is no Court of which the nation is so proud.* Frederick the Great and Wolfgang Goethe have raised these Courts into centres of undying interest. Of Weimar it is necessary we should form a distinct idea, if we would understand the outward life of the poet.

Klein ist unter den Fürsten Germaniens freilich der meine, Kurz und schmal ist sein Land, mässig nur was er vermag.

‘Small among German princes is mine, poor and narrow his kingdom, limited his power of doing good.’ Thus sings Goethe in that poem, so honorable to both, wherein he acknowledges his debt to Karl August. The geographical importance of Weimar was, and is, small; but we in England have proud reason to know how great a place in the world can be filled by a nation whose place is trivial on the map. We know, moreover, that the Athens, which it is the pride of Weimar to claim as a patronymic, was but a dot upon the surface of Europe, a dot of earth, feeding some twenty thousand freemen, who not only extended the empire of their arms from Eubœa to the Thracian Bosphorus, but who left their glories in Literature, Philosophy and Art, as marvels and as models for the civilized world. It is interesting therefore to know how small this Duchy of Saxe-Weimar was, that we may appreciate the influence exercised by means so circumscribed. We must know how absurdly scant the income of its generous prince, who, as I am credibly informed, would occasionally supply the deficiencies of his purse by the princely unprinceliness of selling to the Jews a diamond ring, or ancestral snuff-box, that he might hand the proceeds to some struggling artist or poet. I mention this lest it should be supposed that a sarcastic spirit has dictated the enumeration of unimposing details, in the following attempt to reconstruct some image of Weimar and its Court.

* Vohse : Geschichte der Deutschen Höfe seit der Reformation, vol. xxviii. p. 3.

Weimar is an ancient city on the Ilm, a small stream rising in the Thuringian forests, and losing itself in the Saal, at Jena; a stream on which the sole navigation seems to be that of ducks, and which meanders peacefully through pleasant valleys, except during the rainy season, when mountain torrents swell its current and overflow its banks. The Trent, between Trentham and Stafford — ‘the smug and silver Trent’ as Shakespeare calls it — will give you an idea of this stream. The town is charmingly placed in the Ilm valley, and stands some eight hundred feet above the level of the sea. 'Weimar,' says the old topographer, Mathew Merian, 'is Weinmar, because it was the wine-market for Jena and its environs. Others say it was because some one here in ancient days began to plant the vine, who was hence called Weinmayer. But of this each reader may believe just what he pleases.'*

On a first acquaintance, Weimar seems more like a village bordering a park, than a capital with a Court, and having all courtly environments. It is so quiet, so simple; and although ancient in its architecture, has none of the picturesqueness which delights the eye in most old German cities. The stone-colored, light brown, and apple-green houses have high peaked slanting roofs, but no quaint gables, no caprices of architectural fancy, none of the mingling of varied styles which elsewhere charm the traveller. One learns to love its quiet simple streets and pleasant paths, fit theatre for the simple actors moving across the scene: but one must live there some time to discover its charm. The aspect it presented when Goethe arrived was of course very different from that presented now; but by diligent inquiry we may get some rough image of the place restored. First be it noted that the city walls were still erect; gates and portcullis still spoke of days of warfare. Within these walls were six or seven hundred houses, not more; most of them very ancient. Under these roofs were about seven thousand inhabitants — for the most part not handsome. The city gates were strictly guarded. No one could pass through them in cart or carriage without leaving his name in the sentinel's book: even Goethe, minister and favorite, could not escape this tiresome formality, as we gather from one of his letters to the Frau von Stein, directing her to go out alone, and meet him beyond the gates, lest their exit together should be known. During Sunday service a chain was thrown across the streets leading to the church to bar out all passengers; a practice to this day partially retained: the chain is fastened, but the passengers step over it without ceremony. There was little safety at night in those silent streets; for if you were in no great danger from marauders, you were in constant danger of breaking a limb in some hole or other; the idea of lighting streets not having presented itself to the Thuringian mind. In the year 1685, the streets of London were first lighted with lamps; and Germany, in most things a century behind England, had not yet ventured on that experiment. If in this 1854 Weimar is still innocent of gas, and perplexes its inhabitants with the dim obscurity of an occasional oil-lamp slung on a cord across the streets, we may imagine that in 1775 they had not even advanced so far. And our supposition is exact.*

* Topographia Superioris Saxoniae Thuringiae, etc., 1650, p. 188.

The palace, which now forms three sides of a quadrangle, and is truly palatial in appearance, was in ashes when Goethe arrived. The ducal pair inhabited the Fürstenhaus, which stands opposite. The park was not in existence. In its place there was the Welsche Garten, a garden arranged after the pattern of Versailles, with trees trimmed into set shapes, with square beds, canals, bridges, and a Babylonian spiral tower called Die Schnecke, in which the people assembled to hear music, and to enjoy punch and sweet cakes. To the left of this garden stood the nucleus of the present park, and a wooded mass stretching as far as Upper Weimar.

* In a decree made at Cassel, in 1775, this sentence is noticeable: 'In every house as soon as the alarm sounds at night, every inhabitant must hold out a lighted lantern, in order that the people may find their way in the streets.' Quoted by Biedermann: Deutschland im 18ten Jahrhundert, i. p. 370.

Saxe-Weimar has no trade, no manufactures, no animation of commercial, political, or even theological activity. This part of Saxony, be it remembered, was the home and shelter of Protestantism in its birth. Only a few miles from Weimar stands the Wartburg, where Luther, in the disguise of Squire George, lived in safety, translating the Bible, and hurling his inkstand at the head of Satan, like a roughhanded disputant as he was. In the market-place of Weimar stand, to this day, two houses from the windows of which Tetzels advertised his Indulgences, and Luther in fiery indignation fulminated against them. These records of religious struggle still remain, but are no longer suggestions for the continuance of the strife. The fire is burnt out; and perhaps in no city of Europe is theology so placid, polemics so entirely at rest. The Wartburg still rears its picturesque eminence over the lovely Thuringian valleys, and Luther's room is visited by thousands of pilgrims; but in this very palace of the Wartburg, besides the room where Luther struggled with Satan, the visitors are shown the Banqueting Hall of the Minnesingers, where poet challenged poet, and the Sängerkrieg, or Minstrels' Contest, was celebrated. The contrast may be carried further. It may be taken as a symbol of the intellectual condition of Saxe-Weimar, that while the relics of Luther are simply preserved, the Minstrel Hall is now being restored in more than its pristine splendor. Lutheran theology is crumbling away, just as the famous inkspot has disappeared beneath the gradual scrapings of visitors' penknives; but the Minstrelsy of which the Germans are so proud, daily receives fresh honor and adulation. Nor is this adulation a mere revival. Every year the Wartburg saw assembled the members of that numerous family (the Bachs) which, driven from Hungary in the early period of Reform, had settled in Saxony, and had given, besides the great John Sebastian Bach, so many noble musicians to the world. Too numerous to gain a livelihood in one city, the Bachs agreed to meet every year at the Wartburg. This custom, which was continued till the close of the eighteenth century, not only presented the singular spectacle of one family consisting of no less than a hundred and twenty musicians, but was also the occasion of musical entertainments such as were never heard before. They began by religious hymns, sung in chorus ; they then took for their theme some popular song, comic or licentious, varying it by the improvisation of four, five, or six parts ; these improvisations were named Quolibets, and are considered by many writers to have been the origin of German opera.*

The theologic fire has long burnt itself out in Thuringia. In Weimar, where Luther preached, another preacher came, whom we name Goethe. In the old church there is one portrait of Luther, painted by his friend, Lucas Kranach, and greatly prized, as well it may be ; but for this one portrait of Luther there are a hundred of Goethe. It is not Luther, but Goethe, they think of here ; poetry, not theology, is the glory of Weimar. And corresponding with this, we find the dominant characteristic of the place to be no magnificent church, no picturesque and ancient buildings, no visible image of the middle ages, but the sweet serenity of a lovely park. The park fills the foreground of the picture, and always rises first in the memory. Any one who has spent happy hours wandering through its sunny walks and winding shades, watching its beauties changing through the fulness of summer, and the striking contrasts of autumn as it deepens into winter, will easily understand how Goethe could have been content to live in so small a city, which had, besides its nest of friends, so charming a park. It was indeed mainly his own creation ; and as it filled a large space in his life, it demands more than a passing allusion here.

* I am indebted for these curious details to Franz Linszt, whose genius is only one of the many claims he has to the deep regard of his friends. He now holds at Weimar the post held by John Sebastian Bach in 1707.

Southwards from the palace it begins, with no obstacle of wall or iron gate, servant or sentinel, to seem to shut us out, so let us enter and look round. In the dew of morning, and in the silence of moonlight, we may wander undisturbed as if in our own grounds. The land stretches for miles away without barrier ; park and yellow cornlands forming one friendly expanse. If we pass into it from the palace gates, a winding path to the right conducts us into the Belvedere Allée : a magnificent avenue of chestnut trees, two miles long, stretching from the new street to the summer palace of Belvedere. This affords a shaded promenade along the park, in summer grateful for its coolness, in autumn looking like an avenue of golden trees. It terminates in the gardens of the Belvedere, which has its park also beautifully disposed. Here the Weimarians resort, to enjoy the ‘fresh air’ after their fashion, namely, with accompaniments of bad beer, questionable coffee and detestable tobacco.*

If, instead of turning into the Belvedere Allée, we keep within the Park, our walks are so numerous that choice

* It strikes foreigners with surprise, that the Grand Duke not only permits the freest access to his parks and grounds, but that here and at Tiefurt he permits the restaurant to make the public at home. The Grand Duke is none the worse for such liberality, and the people are all the happier.

becomes perplexing. Let us cross the Stern Brücke, a bridge leading from the palace. Turning to our right we pass along through noble trees, charmed by

‘ The sound of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June,
Which to the quiet trees all night
Singeth a quiet tune.’

We reach the broad road leading to Upper Weimar. On this road, which skirts a meadow washed by the Ilm, we shall pass Goethe’s Gartenhaus (Garden House, to be described hereafter), and then winding round the meadow, cross another bridge, and enter a shadowy path, picturesque with well-grouped trees — the solemn pine, the beech, whose dark green patches of moss increase the brilliancy of its silver bark, the weeping birch with its airy elegance of forms, the plane tree, the elm, the chestnut and the mountain ash, brilliant with berries hanging like clusters of coral against the deep blue of the sky. One steep side of this path is craggy, with masses of moss-covered rock ; beneath the other flows the Ilm. A few paces from the bridge which leads us here, stands the Borkenhaus (Bark House), a hermit’s hut, erected by Goethe for a fête of the duchess, and subsequently the favorite residence of the duke. It is only twenty feet long and fourteen deep, built entirely of wood, and plastered (so to speak) with the bark of trees. It rests against a rock amid the trees, and is surrounded by a wooden gallery, reached by rough wooden steps. Where is the prince who would live in such a hut now-a-days ? Where are the ministers who would attend council in such a hut ? Yet, here Karl August lived alone, glad to escape from the tedium of etiquette, and the palling pleasures of a little court. Here he debated affairs of state, not less momentous to him because they were trivial in European politics.

Here he bathed in the Ilm running beneath. Here he could see the Garden House of his poet, and telegraph to him across the Park. In this single room, which was at once dining-room, council-chamber, study and bedroom, the manly duke lived alone for months.

From the Borkenhaus a small flight of stone steps conducts us to a mimic Ruin, and thence a narrow winding paths leads to a stone monument, interesting as a witness to the growth of a mythos. It is an antique column, four feet high, round which a serpent winds, in the act of devouring the offering cakes on the top. The inscription says, Genio Loci. But the Weimar plebs, disregarding antique symbols, and imperfectly acquainted with Virgil, has a legend to tell; a legend sprung, no one knows whence, rapid and mysterious as the growth of fungi, like most legends, to satisfy the imperious craving of Ignorance for explanations; a legend which certifies how, formerly, a huge serpent dwelt in this spot, the terror of Weimar, until a cunning baker bethought him of placing poisoned cakes within the monster's reach; and when the greedy ignorance of the serpent had relieved Weimar of the monster, a grateful people erected this monument to an energetic and inventive baker. Et voilà, comme on écrit l'histoire!

I will not fatigue the reader by dragging him all over this much loved park, which must be enjoyed directly, not through description; * enough for present purposes if it be added that while the summer palace of Belvedere is connected with Weimar by the chestnut avenue, the summer palace and park of Tiefurt is also connected with

* If a fuller description be desired, the reader will find one in the charming pages of Stahlr's Weimar und Jena, to which I take this occasion of acknowledging a large debt.

Weimar by a richly wooded road, the Webicht. This Tiefurt is a tiny little place, quite a curiosity of diminutiveness. The park, through which runs a branch of the Ilm, is tiny but picturesque. The upper story of the palace is a labyrinth of tiny rooms, some of them so small that, standing with your back against one wall, you can touch the wall opposite with your hand. It was here the Duchess Amalia lived.

‘I have lived here fifty years,’ said Goethe to Eckermann, ‘and where have I not been? but I was always glad to return to Weimar.’ The stranger may wonder wherein lies the charm; but a residence at Weimar soon reveals the secret. Among the charms are the environs. First, there is Ettersburg, with its palace, woods and park, some seven miles distant. Then there is Bercka with its charming valley, dear to all pedestrians, within half-a-dozen miles; a little further is Jena and its enchanting valley, from whose heights we look down on the sombre city, rendered illustrious by so many sounding names. Jena was to science what Weimar was to poetry. Assembled there were men like Griesbach, Paulus, Baumgarten-Crusius, and Danz, to teach theology; Schelling, Fichte, Hegel, Reinhold and Fries, to teach philosophy; Loder, Hufeland, Oken, Döbereiner, to teach science; Luden, Schultz and others, for history. The Schlegels and the Humboldts also lent their lustre to the place. Besides Jena, we must mention Ilmenau, Eisenach, the Thuringian forests, and the valley of the Saal: environs attractive enough for the most restless wanderer.

Having thus sketched the main features of the place, it will now be desirable to give some indication of the times, that we may understand the atmosphere in which Goethe lived. Difficult as the restoration of Weimar has been to me, and only possible through the aid of what still remains from the old time, the difficulty has been tenfold with regard to the more changing aspects of society and opinion. Curiously enough the Germans, famous for writing 'de omne scibile — et scribile,' have produced no work on the state of manners and the domestic conditions of this much-be-written period. The books on Goethe are endless; there is not one which tells us of the outward circumstances among which he moved. From far and wide I have gathered together some details which may aid in forming a picture.

Remember that we are in the middle of the eighteenth century. The French Revolution is as yet only gathering its forces together; nearly twenty years must elapse before the storm breaks. The chasm between that time and our own is vast and deep. Every detail speaks of it. To begin with science — everywhere the torch of civilization — it is enough to say that Chemistry did not then exist. Abundant materials indeed existed, but that which makes a Science, viz., the power of prevision based on quantitative knowledge, was still absent; and Alchemy maintained its place among the conflicting hypotheses of the day. Goethe in Frankfurt was busy with researches after the 'virgin earth.' The philosopher's stone had many eager seekers. In 1787, Semler sent to the Academy of Berlin his discovery that gold grew in a certain atmospheric salt, when kept moist and warm. Klaproth, in the name of the Academy, examined this salt, and found indeed gold leaf in it — which had been put there by Semler's servant to encourage his master's credulity. This was the time when, in spite of all the labors of the encyclopedists, in spite of all the philosophic and religious 'enlightenment,' in spite of Voltaire and La Mettrie, it was possible for Count St. Germain and Cagliostro to delude thousands; and Casanova found a dupe in the Marquise d'Urfé, who believed he could restore her youth, and make the moon impregnate her! It was in 1774 that Mesmer astonished Vienna with his marvels of mystic magnetism. The secret societies of Freemasons and Illuminati, mystic in their ceremonies and chimerical in their hopes — now in quest of the philosopher's stone, now in quest of the perfectibility of mankind — a mixture of religious, political, and mystical reveries, flourished in all parts of Germany, and in all circles.

With such a condition of Science, we are sure to find a corresponding poverty in material comfort and luxury. Highroads, for example, were only found in certain parts of Germany; Prussia had no chaussée till 1787. Milestones were unknown, although finger-posts existed. Instead of facilitating the transit of travellers, it was thought good political economy to obstruct them, for the longer they remained, the more money they spent in the country. A century earlier, stage coaches were known in England; but in Germany, public conveyances, very rude to this day in places where no railway exists, were few and miserable; nothing but open carts with unstuffed seats. Diligences on springs were unknown before 1800; and what they were even twenty years ago many readers doubtless remember. Then as to speed: if you travelled post, it was said with pride that seldom more than an hour's waiting was necessary before the horses were got ready, at least on frequented routes. Mail travelling was at the rate of five English miles an hour and a quarter. Letters took nine days from Berlin to Frankfurt, which in 1854 require only twenty-four hours. So slow was the communication of news that, as we learn from the Stein correspondence, so great an event as the death of Frederick the Great was only known as a rumor a week afterwards in Carlsbad. 'By this time,' writes Goethe, 'you must know in Weimar if it be true.' With these facilities it was natural that men travelled but rarely, and mostly on horseback. What the inns were may be imagined from the unfrequency of travellers, and the general state of domestic comfort.

The absence of comfort and luxury (luxury as distinguished from ornament) may be gathered from the Memoirs of the time, and from such works as Burtuch's Mode Journal. Such necessities as good locks, doors that shut, drawers opening easily, tolerable knives, carts on springs, or beds fit for a Christian of any other than the 'German persuasion,' are still rarities in Thuringia; but in those days, when sewers were undreamed of, and a post-office was a chimera, all that we moderns consider comfort was necessarily fabulous. The furniture, even of palaces, was extremely simple. In the houses of wealthy bourgeoisie, chairs and tables were of common fir; not until the close of the eighteenth century did mahogany make its appearance. Looking-glasses followed. The chairs were covered with a coarse green cloth; the tables likewise; and carpets are only now beginning to loom upon the national mind as a possible luxury. The windows were hung with woollen curtains, when the extravagance of curtains was ventured on. Easy chairs were unknown; the only arm chair allowed was the so-called Grandfather's chair, which was reserved for the dignity of gray hairs or the feebleness of age.

The salon de reception, or drawing-room, into which greatly honored visitors were shown, had of course a kind of Sunday splendor, not dimmed by week-day familiarity. There hung the curtains; the walls were adorned with family portraits or some work of extremely 'native talent;' the tables alluring the eye with china, in guise of cups, vases, impossible shepherds, and very allegorical dogs.

Into this room the honored visitor was ushered ; and there, no matter what the hour, he was handed refreshment of some kind. This custom—a compound product of hospitality and bad inns—lingered until lately in England, and perhaps is still not unknown in provincial towns.

On eating and drinking was spent the surplus now devoted to finery. No one then, except gentlemen of the first water, boasted of a gold snuff-box ; even a gold-headed cane was an unusual elegance. The dandy contented himself with a silver watch. The fine lady blazoned herself with a gold watch and heavy chain ; but it was an heirloom ! To see a modern dinner-service glittering with silver, glass, and china, and to think that even the nobility in those days ate off pewter, is enough to make the lapse of time very vivid to us. A silver tea-pot and tea-tray were held as princely magnificence.

The manners were rough and simple. The journey-men ate at the same table with their masters, and joined in the coarse jokes which then passed for hilarity. Filial obedience was rigidly enforced, the stick or strap not unfrequently aiding parental authority. Even the brothers exercised an almost paternal authority over their sisters. Indeed, the ‘ position of women ’ was by no means such as our women can conceive with patience ; not only were they kept under the paternal, marital, and fraternal yoke, but society limited their actions by its prejudices still more than it does now. No woman, for instance, of the better class of citizens, could go out alone ; the servant girl followed her to church, to a shop, or even to the promenade.

The coarseness of language may be gathered from our own literature of that period. The roughness of manners is shown by such a scene as that in Wilhelm Meister, where the Fair Saint in her confessions (speaking of high, well-born society) narrates how, at an evening party, forfeits were introduced ; one of these forfeits is, that a gentleman shall say something gallant to every lady present ; he whispers in the ear of a lady, who boxes his ears, and boxes it with such violence that the powder from his hair flies into the Fair Saint's eyes ; when she is enabled to see again, it is to see that the husband of the lady has drawn his sword, and stabbed the offender, and that a duel, in the very presence of these women, is only prevented by one of the combatants being dragged from the room.

The foregoing survey would be incomplete without some notice of the prices of things, the more so as we shall learn hereafter that the pension Karl August gave Schiller was 200 thalers — about £60 of our money — and that the salary Goethe received, as Councillor of Legation, was only 1200 thalers — about £200 per annum. On reading this, Mr. Smith jingles the loose silver in his pockets, and with that superb British pride, redolent of consols, which makes the family of Smith so accurate a judge of all social positions, exclaims, ‘These beggarly Germans ! I give my head clerk twice the sum.’ Without, however, wishing to mitigate Mr. Smith’s just contempt, it is necessary I should establish something like the real relation of this sum to the expenses of living. Thus we find in Schiller’s correspondence with Körner, that he hires a riding-horse for sixpence a day (vol. i. p. 84), and gets a manuscript fairly copied at the rate of three halfpence a sheet of sixteen pages (vol. i. p. 92) — with us the charge is twopence for every seventy-two words. The whole of Don Carlos cost but three and sixpence for copying. He hires a furnished apartment, consisting of two rooms and a bedroom, for two pounds twelve and sixpence a quarter (Charlotte von Kalb writing to Jean Paul, Nov. 1796, says his lodgings will only cost him ten dollars, or thirty shillings, a quarter); while his male servant, who in case of need can act as secretary, is to be had for eighteen shillings a quarter (vol. i. p. 111). Reckoning up his expenses he says, 'Washing, servants, the barber, and such things, all paid quarterly, and none exceeding six shillings: so that, speaking in round numbers, I shall hardly need more than four hundred and fifty dollars' (vol. ii. p. 94) — that is, about £70 a year. Even when he is married, and sees a family growing round him, he says, 'With eight hundred dollars I can live here, in Jena, charmingly — recht artig' (vol. ii. p. 153).

It is evident that in Weimar they led no very sumptuous life. A small provincial town, overshadowed by a Court, its modes of life were the expression of this contrast. The people, a slow, heavy, ungraceful, ignorant, but good-natured, happy, honest race, feeding on black bread and sausages; the stupidest people I have ever lived among, and perhaps the ugliest, but a people of whom that is the worst to be said. Rising higher, we find the cultivated classes of employés, artists, and professors, and, higher still, the aristocracy, without the culture of the second class, but with a culture of its own, not far removed from vulgarity of mind — a poor, proud, ignorant nobility, jealous of its small privileges, and believing in the Court as Calvinists believe in Grace.

The Court! That indeed was the centre and crown of Weimarian ambition. 'Noble or not noble?' that was the question. 'Hoffähig oder unfähig — presentable or not presentable at Court?' your salvation lay therein. If you wrote von before your name you were somebody; without the magical von, you might be Goethe, Schiller, or Herder, it mattered little — you were nobody. In the theatre, until 1825, the nobility alone were allowed admission to the boxes; and when the Jena students crowded the pit, elbowing out the Weimar public, that public was forced to return home, or jostle with the students for seats in pit or gallery. Even when the theatre was rebuilt, and the bourgeoisie was permitted a place in the boxes, its place was on the left side of the house, the right being vigorously reserved for the Vons. This continued until 1848; since that year of revolutions the public has had the place it can pay for.

To understand how the court overshadowed the city, we must remember that even so outspoken a democrat as Herder tried to make his more than questionable title — his Pfalzgräflichen Adel — a claim to admission into the court circle. It was refused, and caused no small ridicule to fall on him. We must remember also that Goethe was forced, against his wish, to be ennobled; and that Schiller, shut out from the society to which his titled wife had right of admission, bitterly acquiesced in the like equivocal honor, complaining of the extra expense it entailed. Proud as Schiller was, we have his own word for it, that the acceptance of a title was indispensable. ‘In a little town like Weimar,’ he writes to Körner, ‘it is always a disadvantage to be excluded from anything. For here we find it sometimes very disagreeable, whereas in a large town no notice would be taken of it.’ Long after Goethe had been raised to the nobility, it was said in Weimar that the elevation was merely to enable him to marry the Baroness von Stein. It was nothing of the kind; there was no idea of such a marriage. The reason lay deeper. Even Karl August, wilful and imperious as we shall find him in defence of his friend, felt that he could not persist in disregarding the prejudices of his nobility, and that Goethe must have a title to admission among them. The Duchess Amalia undertook to persuade him of the necessity of his being ennobled.

There is nothing wonderful in this. Castes are castes, and jealous of intruders; and we, who look with reverence at such men of genius as Goethe, Schiller and Herder, believing them to be noble among the noblest, apply a very different standard of measurement, and ignore the standard naturally applied by the Vons. To Serene Stupidities it was doubtless as monstrous that an untitled poet should be counted 'one of them,' as it would seem to Mr. Smith that his friend's 'footman of genius' should dine at table in Portland Place. Nor must the smallness of the Weimar court mislead our judgment. It is quite true the Weimar court but little corresponded with those conceptions of grandeur, magnificence and historical or political importance, with which the name of court is usually associated. But just as in gambling the feelings are agitated less by the greatness of the stake than by the variations of fortune, so in the social gambling of court intrigue, there is the same ambition and agitation, whether the green cloth be an empire or a duchy. Within its limits Saxe-Weimar displayed all that an imperial court displays in larger proportions; it had its ministers, its army, its chamberlains, pages and sycophants. Court favor and disgrace elevated and depressed, as if they had been imperial smiles or autocratic frowns. A standing army of six hundred men, with cavalry of fifty hussars, had its War Department, with war minister, secretary and clerk.*

The nobles were narrowed within the limits of their prejudices ; they were also for the most part of mediocre ability ; to say they were mostly stupid, is to say that they were men and women. And as they formed the predominating element of Weimar, we see at once how, in spite of the influence of Karl August, and the remarkable men he assembled round him, no real public for Art could be found there. Some of the courtiers played more or less with Art, some had real feeling for it ; but the majority set decided faces against all the beaux esprits. When the Duchess Amalia travelled with Merck in 1778, Weimar was loud in anticipatory grumblings : ‘ She will doubtless bring back some bel esprit picked up en route ! ’ was the common cry. And really when one comes to consider the habits of these beaux esprits, and their way of making life ‘ genial ’ (as a future chapter will reveal), impartiality confesses that this imperfect sympathy on the part of the Vons was not without its reason.

* Lest this should appear too ridiculous, I will add that one of the small princes (the Graf von Limburg Styrum) kept a corps of hussars, which consisted of a colonel, six officers, and two privates!

Not without profound significance is this fact that in Weimar the poet found a Circle, but no Public. To welcome his productions there were friends and admirers ; there was no Nation. Germany had no public ; nor has it to this day. It was, and is, a collection of cities, not a Nation. To appreciate by contrast the full significance of such a condition, we must look at Greece and Rome. There the history of Art tells the same story as is everywhere told by the history of human effort. It tells us that to reach the height of perfection there must be the co-operation of the Nation with individual Genius. Thus it is necessary for the development of science that science should cease to be the speculation of a few, and become the minister of the many ; from the constant pressure of unsatisfied wants science receives its energetic stimulus and its highest reward. In Art the same law holds. In Athens the whole Nation co-operated with the Artists, and this is one cause why Athenian Art rose into unsurpassed splendor. Art was not the occupation of a few, ministering to the luxury of a few. It was the luxury of all. Its triumphs were not hidden in galleries and museums ; they blazed in the noonday sun, they were admired and criticized by the whole people, and, as Aristotle expressly says, every free citizen was from youth upwards a critic of Art. Sophocles wrote for all Athens, and by all Athens was applauded. The theatre was open to all free citizens. Phidiās and Praxiteles, Scopas and Myron, wrought their marvels in brass and marble as expressions of a national faith, and as delights of a national mind. Temples and market-places, public groves and public walks, were the galleries wherein these sculptors placed their works. The public treasury was liberal in its rewards, and the rivalry of private munificence was not displayed to secure works for private galleries, but to enrich the public possessions. The citizens of Gnidus chose to continue the payment of an onerous tribute rather than suffer their statue of Venus to quit their city. And when some murmurs rose against the expense which Pericles was incurring in the building of the Parthenon, he silenced those murmurs by the threat of furnishing the money from his private purse and then placing his name on the majestic work.

Stahr, who has eloquently exhibited the effects of such national co-operation in Art, compares the similar influence of publicity during the Middle Ages, when the great painters and sculptors placed their works in cathedrals, open all day long, in council-houses and market-places, whither the people thronged, with the fact that in our day Art finds refuge in the galleries of private persons, or in museums closed on Sundays and holidays.*

* See his Torso, pp. 147-151.

Nor is this all. The effect of Art upon the Nation is visible in the striking fact that in Greece and Rome the truly great men were crowned by the public, not ignored in favor of one who pandered to the fashion and the tastes of a Few, or who flattered the first impressions of the Many. It was young Phidias whom the Athenians chose to carve the statue of Pallas Athene and to build the Parthenon. Suppose Phidias had been an Englishman, would he have been selected by government to give the nation a statue of Wellington or to build the Houses of Parliament? The names most revered by contemporaries in Greece and in Italy are the names which posterity has declared to be the highest. Necessarily so. The verdict of the public, when that public includes the whole intelligence of the nation, must be the correct verdict in Art.

That Goethe felt the necessity of a Nation to co-operate with the Artist is clearly seen in many passages; the following from Tasso may suffice :

In a contracted sphere a noble man
 Cannot develope all his mental powers.
On him his country and the world must work.
 He must endure both censure and applause;
 Must be compelled to estimate aright
Himself and others. Solitude no more
 Lulls him delusively with flattering dreams.
 Opponents will not, friendship dares not, spare.
 Then in the strife the youth puts forth his powers,
 Knows what he is, and feels himself a man.

CHAPTER II.

THE NOTABILITIES OF WEIMAR.

The Dowager Duchess Amalia — Mlle. Göchhausen — Wieland — Einsiedel — Corona Schröter — Bertuch — Musæus — Seckendorf — The Duchess Luise — Karl August — Gräfin Werther — Frau von Stein — Knebel — Herder.

HAVING endeavored to reconstruct some image of Weimar and its people, we may now descend from generals to particulars, and sketch rapidly the principal figures which will move across that scene during the first years of Goethe's residence.

The Dowager Duchess Amalia is a very interesting figure. She had the Brunswick blood, with its capriciousness, love of pleasure and frivolity ; but she had also a mind well cultivated, not poorly gifted, and ready in appreciating men of talent. Although a niece of Frederick the Great, she did not follow the princely fashion of the day, and turn her eyes away from German Literature to fix them only upon France. She chose Wieland as the tutor of her son, and made him her own dear friend. Schiller, a rash judge of persons, and not very keen in his perception of woman's character, wrote to Körner, after his first interview with the Duchess : ' She has made no conquest of me. I cannot like her physiognomy. Her intellect is extremely limited, nothing interests her but what is based on the sensuous : hence the taste she has, or affects to have, for music, painting, and the rest. She is a composer herself, and has set Goethe's Erwin und Elmire to music. She speaks little ; but has, at any rate, the merit of throwing aside all the stiffness of ceremony.' Schiller's verdict cannot be accepted by any one who reflects, that, besides her appreciation of men of talent, who found delight in her society, she learned Greek from Wieland, read Aristophanes and translated Propertius, was a musical composer, a tolerable judge of art, discussed politics with the Abbé Raynal, and Greek and Italian Literature with Villoison ; that, moreover, with all her multifarious reading and enjoyments, she contrived to superintend the education of her sons, and manage her kingdom with unusual success. This is not to be done by an 'extremely limited intellect.'

The 'sensuous basis' alluded to by Schiller was certainly there. One sees it in her portraits. One sees it also in the glimpses of her joyous, pleasure-loving existence. Biographers and eulogists omit such details ; for in general the biographical mind moves only through periods of rhetoric, which may be applied with equal felicity to every prince or princess of whom it is the cue to speak. But it is by such details that the image of the Duchess can alone be made a living one. Here, for example, is a sketch of her, given by an anonymous traveller.* 'She is small in stature, good-looking, with a very spirituelle physiognomy ; she has the Brunswick nose, lovely hands and feet, a light yet princely gait, speaks well but rapidly, and has something amiable and fascinating in her nature. . . . This evening there was a Redoute, tickets one gulden (two francs) each. The Court arrived at eight. The Duchess was magnificent, en domino, and brilliant with jewels. She dances well, lightly and gracefully. The young princes, who were attired as Zephyr and Amour, also danced well. The masquerade was very full, lively and varied. A faro table was laid out: the smallest stake being half a gulden. The Duchess staked dollars and half-louis, played generously and lost. But as she was glad to dance, she did not play long. She danced with every mask who invited her, and stayed till nearly three o'clock, when almost every one had gone home.' The same writer also speaks of another Redoute. 'The Duchess appeared en reine grecque, a very beautiful costume, which suited her well. The ball was very brilliant; some students from Jena were there. At the last ball of the season, the Duchess sent me one of her own Savoyard dresses, and I was frisé and dressed like a woman by the Countess von Görtz's maid. The young Count was likewise dressed as a woman, and we went to Court so, dined there, and drove thence to the ball, which lasted till six o'clock.'

* Quoted from Bernouilli by Vehse : Geschichte der Deutschen Höfe, vol. xxviii. p. 60.

This pleasure-loving Duchess, who knew so well how to manage her kingdom, cared little for the 'dignities' of her state. According to Wieland, she lived sometimes in 'student' fashion, especially at Belvedere, where student-songs, not always the most decorous, rang joyously through the moonlit gardens. Driving once with seven friends in a haycart from Tiefurt, and overtaken by a storm, she made no more ado, but drew over her light clothing Wieland's great coat, and in that costume drove on!

Her letters, especially those to Goethe's mother, several of which I have seen, have great heartiness, and the most complete absence of anything like formality. In one of them, I remember, she apologizes for not having written for some time, not from want of friendship, but lack of news ; to show that she has been thinking of Frau Aja, she sends her a pair of garters worked by herself. ‘Liebe Frau Aja !’ she writes on another occasion, ‘My joy at the receipt of your letter is not easily described, nor will I attempt it, for true feelings are too sacred to be set down in black and white. You know, dear mother, what you are to me, and can believe how infinitely your remembrance of me has rejoiced me.’ *

Beside the figure of the Duchess Amalia, we see that of the merry and malicious little humpbacked Göchhausen, her maid of honor, by intimates named Thusnelda. One sees not why this spritely little démon de bonne compagnie should have been named after the wife of Arminius. She was a great favorite with Amalia, with Karl August also, who was constantly engaged in ‘wit combats’ with her, not always of the mildest. She animated society with her devices, and kept up a voluminous correspondence with wits and notabilities in other cities. She was very fond of Goethe, and wrote constantly to his mother. But Karl August was her darling, perhaps because he plagued her so incessantly. As a sample of the lengths to which tricks were carried, consider the following anecdote, which I have from Frau von Goethe, who had it from her father-in-law, an accomplice in the deed. One night as Thusnelda came up the stairs leading to her bedroom, her candle was blown out. Not much heeding this, she went on, reached the gallery into which her bedroom opened, and walked on, feeling for the door. There is no great difficulty in finding the door of your own room in the dark, yet Thusnelda groped, and groped, and groped in vain : no lock met her hand, a smooth blank wall allowed her hand to pass and repass over it with increasing confusion. Where was the door ? Where was she ? After groping some time, her perplexity growing into undefined alarm, she descended to the Duchess's room ; but she found that closed ; the Duchess was asleep ; and her gentle knockings were not answered. Up stairs she went again, again to pass her hands along the wall, but still to find no door. The night was cold, and she was half-frozen with cold and fear before the mystery was explained : the Duke and Goethe had removed her door, and built up the wall in its place.

* Here is another extract, which I leave in the original : ‘Ach Mutter, Mutter ! — sie errathen wohl meiner Gedanken ! was macht der alter Vater ? er sollte ja nicht wohl seyn. Grüssen sie ihn von mir, und das tausendmal. Leben Sie wohl, beste Mutter ; behalten Sie mir lieb und denken fleissig an ihre Freundin. Amalia.’

Wieland, who has already been characterized, had established his paper, the Teutsche Merkur, which was not without its influence. When he ceased to be the prince's tutor, he remained the valued friend of the Duchess. He was in all the pleasure parties. So also was Einsiedel, who, at first court page, became chamberlain to the Duchess Amalia in 1776. A jovial careless epicurean ; everywhere known as l'ami, from his good nature and eccentricity ; filling the mouth of gossip with his extravagances ; poet and musician in a small way ; actor and inventor of amusements, his name meets us on every page of the Weimar chronicles. Among his follies may be mentioned the characteristic adventure with the Frau von Werther, who gave herself out as dead, had a figure buried in her name, and went off with Einsiedel to — Africa ! She came back soon after, and separated from her husband in due form.

Einsiedel makes us think of Corona Schröter, the Hofsängerin (singer to the court — we have no such word, because we have no such thing). This beautiful and accomplished creature Goethe had known while he was a student at Leipsic, and when, shortly after his arrival at Weimar, he made an expedition to Leipsic with the Duke, he saw her there again and induced her to come to Weimar. She was the grace of their private theatricals, and the original personator of Iphigenia.

‘ Als eine Blume zeigt sie sich der Welt,’ says Goethe of her, in that passage wherein he has immortalized her and Mieding.* What a description :

She, like a flower, opens to the world !

Corona painted, sang, played, was learned in music, and declaimed with peculiar elegance, —

‘ The Muses lavished on her every art.’

According to Karl August, she was ‘ marble-beautiful, but marble-cold ;’ Goethe says of her :

‘ Und hoch erstaunt, seht Ihr in ihr vereint
Ein Ideal, das Künstlern nur erscheint.’ †

There is a notion current, originating with Riemer, but shown by Schöll to be very improbable, that Goethe had a liaison with Corona. I not only agree with Schöll’s reasoning, but can corroborate it by the testimony of the Frau von Goethe, who assured me her father-in-law expressly and emphatically told her that he never had a passion for any actress. Varnhagen von Ense suspects that Corona was privately married to Einsiedel ; if not, her letters, still extant although inedited, prove that they were on the footing of lovers.

Another chamberlain, poet and musician was Seckendorf, who translated Werther into French, a year after Goethe’s arrival (Les Souffrances du Jeune Werther. Par le B. S. d. S. Erlangen, 1776); and to these gay companions must be added Bode, the translator of Cervantes and Smollett; Bertuch, the treasurer; and Musæus, the collector of Volksmärchen — a passionate lover of gardening, who gave Weimar its pleasant Erholung, and who might be seen daily crossing the quiet streets with a cup of coffee in one hand, his garden tools in the other, trudging along to his loved Erholung.

* See the poem Mieding’s Tod.

† And gently awed, you feel in her combined
What is Ideal in the artist’s mind.

These are the principal figures of Amalia's Court. We may now glance at the Court of the reigning Duke and Duchess — Karl August and Luise.

Of the Duchess Luise no one ever speaks but in terms of veneration. She was one of those rare beings who, through circumstances the most trying, as well as through the ordinary details of life, manifest a noble character. The Queen of Prussia and the Duchess of Saxe-Weimar are two of the great figures in modern German history, who both opposed the chief man of the age, Napoleon, and were both admired by him for that very opposition. Luise was so grand a creature that we can afford to add that she was of a cold temperament, somewhat rigid in her enforcement of etiquette (in this so unlike the dowager), and wore to the last the old costume which had been the fashion in her youth; apt in the early years of her marriage to be a little querulous with her husband, but showing throughout their lives a real and noble friendship for him. And he was worthy of that friendship, much as his strange, and in many respects opposite nature, may have tried her. Karl August, whom Frederick the Great pronounced, at fourteen, to be the prince, of all he had seen, who gave the greatest promise, was in truth a very mixed, but very admirable, character. He can afford to be looked at more closely and familiarly than most princes. He was a man whose keen appreciation of genius not only drew the most notable men of the day to Weimar, but whose own intrinsically fine qualities kept them there. It is easy for a prince to assemble men of talent. It is not easy for a prince to make them remain beside him, in the full employment of their faculties, and in reasonable enjoyment of their position. Karl August was the prince who with the smallest means produced the greatest result in Germany. He was a man of restless activity. His eye was on every part of his dominions; his endeavors to improve the condition of the people were constant. In his tastes no man in Germany was so simple, except his dearest friend, Goethe, with whom, indeed, he had many cardinal points in common. I remember, on first seeing their busts together, being struck with a sort of faint family resemblance between them. Karl August might have been a younger brother, considerably ‘animalized,’ but still belonging to the family. They had both, on the paternal side, Thuringian blood in their veins; and in many respects Amalia and Frau Aja were akin. But while Karl August had the active, healthy, sensuous, pleasure-loving temperament of his friend, he wanted the tact, which never allowed Goethe, even in his wildest period, to overstep limits; he wanted the tenderness and chivalry which made the poet so uniformly acceptable to women. He was witty, but his bon-mots are mostly of that kind which, repeated after dinner, are not considered fit for drawing-room publication. Very characteristic is it of him, who had bestowed unusual pains in collecting a Bibliotheca Erotica, that when Schiller wrote the Maid of Orleans he fancied Schiller was going to give another version of La Pucelle, and abetted his mistress, the Frau von Heygendorf, in her refusal to play the part of the rehabilitated Maiden! He was rough, soldierly, brusque and imperious. He was at home when in garrison with

Prussian soldiers, but out of his element when at foreign Courts, and not always at ease in his own. Goethe describes him longing for his pipe at the Court of Brunswick in 1784: 'De son coté notre bon Duc s'ennuie terriblement, il cherche un interet, il n'y voudrait pas etre pour rien, la marche très bien mesurée de tout ce qu'on fait ici le gene, il faut qu'il renonce a sa chere pipe et une fee ne pourroit lui rendre un service plus agreable qu'en changant ce palais dans une cabane de charbonnier.'* In a letter (unprinted), he writes to Goethe, then at Jena, saying he longs to be with him to watch sunrise and sunset, for he can't see the sunset in Gotha, hidden as it is by the crowd of courtiers, who are so comme il faut, and know their 'fish duty' with such terrible accuracy, that every evening he feels inclined to give himself to the devil. His delight, when not with soldiers, was to be with dogs, or with his poet alone in their simple houses, discussing philosophy, and 'talking of lovely things that conquer death.' He mingled freely with the people. At Ilmenau he and Goethe put on the miners' dress, descended into the mines, and danced all night with peasant girls. Riding across country, over rock and stream, in manifest peril of his neck; teasing the maids of honor, sometimes carrying this so far as to offend his more princely wife; wandering alone with his dogs, or with some joyous companion; seeking excitement in wine, and in making love to pretty women, without much respect of station; offending by his roughness and wilfulness, though never estranging his friends — Karl August, often grieving his admirers, was, with all his errors, a genuine and admirable character. His intellect was active, his judgment, both of men and things, sound and keen. Once, when there was a discussion about appointing Fichte as professor at Jena, one of the opponents placed a work of Fichte's in the Duke's hands, as sufficient proof that such a teacher could not hold a chair. Karl August read the book — and appointed Fichte. He had great aims; he also had the despotic will which bends circumstances to its determined issues. 'He was always in progress,' said Goethe to Eckermann; 'when anything failed, he dismissed it at once from his mind. I often bothered myself how to excuse this or that failure; but he ignored every shortcoming in the cheerfulest way, and always went forward to something new.'

* Briefe an Frau von Stein, iii. p. 85. The French is Goethe's, as also spelling and accent, or rather want of accent

Such was Karl August, as I conceive him from the letters of the period, and from the reports of those who knew him. Eight years younger than Goethe, he attached himself to him as to a brother. We shall see this attachment and its reciprocal influences in the following pages; clouds sometimes gather, quarrels and dissatisfaction are not absent (from what long friendship are they absent?); but fifty years of mutual service and mutual love proved the genuineness of both their characters.

Among the Weimar notables, Frau von Stein must always have conspicuous eminence. In a future chapter we shall learn more of her. Enough for the present to say that she was Hofdame (Lady of Honor) to the Duchess Amalia, and for many years the passionately loved idol of Goethe. Beside her we may mention the Countess von Werther, who was to Karl August what the Baroness von Stein was to Goethe. She, as is well known, is the original of the charming Countess in Wilhelm Meister, and her husband was still more eccentric than the eccentric Count. It is related of him that once when the Duke and some other illustrious guests were in his chateau, he collected several of his peasants, dressed them in his livery, and blacked their faces to make them pass as negroes !

To close this list we have Major von Knebel, the translator of Lucretius and Propertius, an honest, upright, satirical republican, the intimate friend of Karl August and Goethe, the ‘ philanthropic Timon,’ as Herder called him, severe against all shams and insincerities, but loving the human nature he declaimed against. As one looks upon his rough, genial, Socratic head, one seems to hear the Jo ! Jo ! issuing from his mouth ; as one reads his correspondence, the accents of an independent, thoroughly honest nature, give weight to what he says.

I have omitted Herder. He did not come to Weimar till after Goethe, and indeed was drawn there by Goethe, whose admiration for him, begun at Strasburg, continued unabated. The strange bitterness and love of sarcasm in Herder’s nature, which could not repel the young student, did not alter the affection of the man. In one of Goethe’s unpublished letters to the Duchess Amalia, there is an urgent appeal on behalf of Herder, whose large family had to be supported on very straitened means ; the Duke had promised to provide for one of the children, and Goethe writes to Amalia, begging her to do the same for another. No answer coming to this appeal, or at any rate no prompt notice being taken, he writes again more urgently, adding, that if she does not provide for the child, he (Goethe), out of his small income, will ! And this was at a time when Herder was most bitter against Goethe. Well might Merck exclaim : ‘ No one can withstand the disinterestedness of this man ! ’

CHAPTER III.

THE FIRST WILD WEEKS AT WEIMAR.

THIS was the circle into which Goethe entered in all the splendor of youth, beauty and fame : Youth, which, according to the fine conception of the Greeks, is ‘the herald of Venus ;’ Beauty, which those Greeks adored as the splendor of Truth ; and Fame, which has at all times been a halo dazzling to mortal eyes. Thus equipped for conquest, how can we wonder that he conquered ? Even Amalia, angry with him for having ridiculed her darling Wieland, could not withstand the magic of his presence. Her love of genius left her no choice. She was fascinated by his wild ways, and by his splendid talents. One moment he startled her with a paradox, the next moment he sprang from his seat, waltzing and whirling round the room with antics which made her scream with laughter. And Wieland ? — he was conquered at once. He shall speak for himself, in a letter written after their first interview : ‘How perfectly I felt at the first glance, he was a man after my own heart ! How I loved the magnificent youth as I sat beside him at table ! All that I can say (after more than one crisis which I have endured) is this ; since that morning my soul is as full of Goethe as a dew drop of the morning sun. . . . I believe the Godlike creature will remain longer with us than he intended ; and if Weimar can do anything, his presence will accomplish it.' This is very honorable to Wieland : the gray Nestor gazes with unenvious delight upon the young Achilles. Heroic eyes are always proud to recognize heroic proportions.

After Wieland and the Duchess, the rest were easy to conquer. 'He rose like a star in the heavens,' says Knebel. 'Everybody worshipped him, especially the women.' In the costume of his own Werther, which was instantly adopted by the Duke, he seemed the ideal of a poet. To moderns there are no very sentimental suggestions in a costume which was composed of blue coat and brass buttons, top-boots and leather breeches, the whole surmounted by powder and pig-tail ; but in those days this costume was the suggestion of everything tender and romantic. Werther had consecrated it.* The Duke not only adopted it, but made all around him adopt it also, sometimes paying the tailor's bill himself. Wieland alone was excepted ; he was too old for such masqueradings.

Thoroughly to appreciate the effect of his influence with women, we must remember the state of feeling and opinion at the time. Those were the days of gallantry, the days of 'Puffs, paints and patches, powders, billets doux.'

The laxity of German morals differed only from the more audacious licentiousness of France in having sentimentalism in lieu of gayety and luxuriousness, for its basis. The heart of a French marquise was lost over a suppertable sparkling with champagne and bon-mots ; the heart of a German Gräfin yielded more readily to moonlight

*It should be remembered, that in Germany, at that time, boots were only worn in very bad weather ; and in the presence of women no one ever appeared except with shoes and silk stockings.

melancholy and a copy of verses. Wit and audacity were the batteries for a French woman ; the German was stormed with sonnets and a threat of suicide. For the one, Lothario needed sprightliness and bon ton ; for the other, turbulent disgust at all social arrangements, expressed in interjectional rhetoric, and a deportment outrageous to all conventions. It is needless to add that marriage was to a great extent what Sophie Arnould, with terrible wit, called ‘ the sacrament of adultery ; ’ and that on the subject of the sexes the whole tone of feeling was low. Poor, simple, earnest Schiller, whom no one will accuse of laxity, admired Les Liasons Dangereuses, and saw no reason why women should not read it ; although to our age the infamy of that book is so great as to stamp a brand upon the society which produced and applauded it. Yet even Schiller, who admired this book, was astounded at the condition of women at Weimar. ‘ There is hardly one of them,’ he writes to Körner, ‘ who has not had a liaison. They are all coquettes. . . . One may very easily fall into an “ affair of the heart,” though it will not last any time.’ It was thought, apparently, that since Eros had wings, he must use them and fly.*

With this tone of society we can understand how, as Goethe in after-life confessed to Eckermann, the first years at Weimar were ‘ perplexed with love affairs.’ A great admirer of women, and greatly admired by them, it was natural he should fall into their snares. Many charmers are named ; among them, Fräulein von Kalb, * Plato, somewhere in the Phædrus, cites one of the Homeridæ to the effect that the God men called Εἰώτα, the Gods call ‘ Highflyer,’ Πτερωτα, — ‘ owing to an innate necessity impelling him to flight,’ δια πτεροφυτοῦ ἀναγκη. Indeed, Eros is everywhere a young gentleman of roving disposition ; stops out late o’ nights, and alarms his mother thereby (see her complaints in Moschus).

Corona Schröter, and Kotzebue's sister, Amalia: but I am bound to say that, after the most diligent inquiry, I can find no reliable evidence for believing any one of those named to have been really loved by him. We must content ourselves with the fact of his having flirted considerably: making love to every bright pair of eyes which for a moment could make him believe what he said.*

For the first few months he gave himself up to the excitement of this new life. Among other things he introduced skating. Weimar had hitherto seen no gentleman on the ice; but now, Klopstock having made skating famous by his poetry, Goethe made it fashionable by his daring grace. Skating on the Schwansee became 'the rage.' Sometimes of nights the banks were illuminated with lamps and torches, music and fireworks animating the scene. The Duchess and ladies, masked as during carnival, were driven in sledges over the noisy ice. 'We are somewhat mad here,' Goethe writes to Merck, 'and play the devil's own game.' Wieland's favorite epithet for him was wüthig — outrageous; and wüthig he was. I catch strange glimpses of him, now dashing across the ice, now loosening his long hair in Bertuch's room, and, with locks flowing over his shoulders, whirling round in mad Bacchante waltz; now startling Weimar by endeavoring, as Wieland says, 'to brutalize bestial nature;' and finally, standing in the market-place with the Duke by the hour together, smacking huge sledge whips for a wager. Imagine a Duke and a Poet thus engaged in a public market-place!

His constant companion, and in all develries and dissipation his most jovial associate, was Karl August. All ceremony was laid aside between them. They dined together, often shared the same bed-room, and called each other by the brotherly thou. 'Goethe will never leave this place again,' writes Wieland; 'K. A. can no longer swim or wade without him. The court, or rather his liaison with the Duke, wastes his time, which is really a great pity — and yet — with so magnificent and godlike a creature nothing is ever lost!' Weimar was startled in its more respectable, grave circles by the conduct of these two and their associates: conduct quite in keeping with the period named 'the genial.'* In their orgies they drank wine out of skulls (as Byron and his friends did in their wild days), and in ordinary intercourse exhibited but a very mitigated respect for meum and teum, borrowing handkerchiefs and waistcoats which were never returned. The favorite epithet of that day was 'infinite:' Genius swallowed infinite sausages, drank infinitely, loved infinitely.

* 'Ich log und trog mich bei allen hübschen Gesichtern herum, und hatte den Vorthail immer ein Augenblick zu glauben was ich sagte,' he says in a letter to the Frau von Stein, vol. i. p. 5.

But the poet's nature soon wearies of such scenes. After some two months of dissipation, in masking, skating, hunting, drinking and dicing, the want to be once more among simple people and lovely scenes drove him away from Weimar to Waldeck. Amid the crowded tumult of life he ever kept his soul sequestered; and from the hot air of society he broke impatiently away to the serenity of solitude. While on this journey along the pine-clad mountains, there came over him a feeling of the past, in which the image of Lili painfully reappeared.

He was called back to Weimar by the Duke, impatient of his absence; and, while debating in his own mind whether he should accept a place there, or return to Frankfurt, he began to take his seat, as a guest, in the Privy Council. He had tried the Court, and now he was about to try what virtue lay in government. 'I am here as if at home,' so runs one of his letters, 'and the Duke daily becomes dearer to me.' Indeed his father's prognostications had failed. The connection between his son and the Duke was of a totally different kind from that between Voltaire and Fritz. In secret Voltaire despised the verses of his patron, as his patron in secret despised the weakness of Voltaire. A few unguarded expressions were enough to snap the link which bound them together; but a lifetime only deepened the regard of Goethe and Karl August. Nor must it be supposed that their friendship was merely that of boon companions. Both had high aims and strong wills. Prince Hal might recreate himself with Falstaff, Pistol, Bardolph and the rest; but while chucking Mrs. Quickly under the chin, he knew he was one day to be England's lord. Karl August and Goethe were not the men to lose themselves in the fleeting hours of dissipation; serious, steady business was transacted almost the moment before some escapade:

* It is difficult to find an English word to express the German genial, which means pertaining to genius. The genial period was the period when every extravagance was excused on the plea of genius.

Mein Carl und ich vergessen hier
Wie seltsam uns ein tiefes Schicksal leitet.
Und ach! ich fühl's, im stillen werden wir Zu neuen Scenen vorbereitet.

'My Karl and I here forget the strange mysterious Fate which guides us; and I feel that in quiet moments we are slowly preparing for new scenes.' Yes, they learned 'in the happy present to forecast the future.'

The Duke knew what he was doing when he overstepped all precedent, and, in June 1776, elected Goethe to the Post of Geheime Legations Rath, with a seat and voice in the Privy Council, and a salary of 1200 thalers. In writing to Goethe's father, the Duke intimated that there was absolute freedom of leaving the service at will, and that indeed the appointment was a mere formality, no measure of his affection. 'Goethe can have but one position — that of my friend. All others are beneath him.

The post of Geheime Legations Rath at Weimar is not a very magnificent post; and the salary of 1200 thalers (about 200*l.*) seems still less magnificent when we remember that at that period the King of Prussia gave the Barberini, an Italian dancer, exactly ten times the sum. But, such as it was, the appointment created great noise. Weimar was thunderstruck. The favor shown to Wieland had not passed without scandal; but alarming indeed was this elevation of a Frankfurt bourgeois. A poet, who wrote no von before his name, who had gone through none of the routine of business, whose life was anything but 'respectable,' to be lifted suddenly over the plodding heads of legitimate aspirants! If this was to be, what reward could meritorious mediocrity expect? what advantage had slowly acquired routinary knowledge?

So murmured a scandalized Court. At last these murmurs expressed themselves distinctly in the shape of a protest. The Duke thought the act worthy of a deliberate justification, and with his own hand added these words to the protocol of the acts of his ministry: 'Enlightened persons congratulate me on possessing such a man. His genius and capacity are well known. To employ a man of such a stamp in any other functions than those in which he can render available the extraordinary gifts he possesses, is to abuse them. As to the observation that persons of merit may think themselves unjustly passed over: I observe, in the first place, that nobody to my knowledge, in my service, has a right to reckon on an equal degree of favor ; and I add that I will never consent to be governed by mere length of service or rotation in my choice of a person whose functions place him in such immediate relation to myself, and are so important to the happiness of my people. In such a case I shall attend to nothing but the degree of confidence I can repose in the person of my choice. The public opinion which perhaps censures the admission of Dr. Goethe to my council without having passed through the previous steps of Amtmann, Professor, Kammerath, or Regierungsrath, produces no effect on my own judgment. The world forms its opinion on prejudices ; but I watch and work — as every man must who wishes to do his duty — not to make a noise, not to attract the applause of the world, but to justify my conduct to God and my conscience.’

Assuredly we may echo M. Dumont’s sentiment, that ‘the prince who, at nineteen, wrote those words, was no ordinary man.’ He had not only the eye to see greatness, he had also the strong Will to guide his conduct according to his views, untrammelled by routine and formulas. ‘Say what you will, it is only like can recognize like, and a prince of great capacity will always recognize and cherish greatness in his servants.’* People saw that the Duke was resolved. Murmurs were silenced ; or only percolated the gossip of private circles, till other subjects buried them, as all gossip is buried.

It is just to add that there was some reason in the murmurs of Weimar. In those days the nobles everywhere regarded places as their privilege ; and when a bourgeois of ability was once proposed to fill a place, the King of Bavaria exclaimed, ‘What, must I employ an adventurer?’ (Does not the feeling still linger in England?) It was thought a great thing of Frederick August of Saxony that he held merit to be a claim. Besides this general feeling, which Goethe's appointment must have ruffled, the mode of life which the genial company led was not only the subject of gossip in Weimar, it grew and grew as scandals grow, not losing substance on the way, and reached the ears of distant friends. Thus only a month before the appointment, Klopstock wrote to Goethe a letter which scandal extorted from friendship.

* Goethe to Eckermann, iii. p. 232.

‘Hamburg, 8th of May, 1776.

‘Here is a proof of my friendship, dearest Goethe! It is somewhat difficult, I confess, to give it, but it must be given. Do not fancy that I wish to preach to you about your doings; or that I judge harshly of you because you have other views than mine. But your views and mine quite set aside, what will be the inevitable consequence if your present doings continue? The Duke, if he continues to drink as he does, instead of strengthening, as he says, his constitution, will ruin it; and will not live long. Young men of powerful constitutions — and that the Duke is not — have in this way early perished. The Germans have hitherto, and with justice, complained that their princes would have nothing to do with authors. They now gladly make an exception in favor of the Duke. But what a justification will not the other princes have, if you continue your present tone? If only that should happen which I feel will happen! The Duchess will perhaps still subdue her pain, for she has a strong, manly intellect. But that pain will become grief! And can that be suppressed? Louisa's grief, Goethe! . . . I must add a word about Stolberg. He goes to Weimar out of friendship for the Duke. He must also live well with him. But how? In his style? No! unless he, too, becomes altered, he will go away. And then what remains for him? Not in Copenhagen, not in Weimar. I must write to Stolberg; what shall I say to him? You may please yourself about showing this letter to the Duke. I have no objection against it. On the contrary; for he is assuredly not yet arrived at that point when he will not listen to the honest word of a friend.

‘KLOPSTOCK.’

Goethe's answer, dated the 21st May, a fortnight later therefore, runs thus:

‘In future, spare us such letters, dear Klopstock! They do no good, and only breed bad blood. You must feel yourself that I have no answer to make. Either I must, like a school-boy, begin a Pater peccavi, or sophistically excuse, or as an honest fellow defend, and perhaps a mingling of all these might express the truth, but to what purpose? Therefore, not a word more between us on this subject. Believe me, I should not have a moment's rest if I replied to all such admonitions. It pained the Duke a moment to think it was Klopstock. He loves and honors you; you know I do the same. Good bye. Stolberg must come all the same. We are no worse; and with God's help will be better than what he has seen us.’

To this Klopstock indignantly replied —

‘You have much misunderstood the proof of my friendship, which was great, precisely because of my reluctance to mix myself unasked in the affairs of others. And as you include all such letters and all such admonitions (your expressions are as strong as that) in the same class with the letter which contained this proof of my friendship, I hereby declare you unworthy of that friendship. Stolberg shall not come, if he listens to me, or rather, if he listens to his own conscience.’

The breach thus made was never repaired. Stolberg did not come to Weimar; and Klopstock wrote no more.

To return : whatever basis there may have been for the report which Gossip magnified, certain it is that the Duke did not forget the cares of state in these wild orgies. Both he and his friend were very active, and very serious. If Weimar, according to the historian of Germany,* stands as an illustrious exception among the German Courts, it was because Karl August, upheld by his friend, knew how to carry into earnest practice the axiom of Frederick the Great : ‘A king is but the first of subjects.’ Goethe’s beneficent activity is seen less in such anecdotes as those often cited of his opening a subscription for Bürger to enable him to complete his translation of Homer, and of his relieving Jung Stilling from distress, than in the constant and democratic sympathy with which he directed the Duke’s endeavors; and if ever the correspondence between him and Karl August should be published, the force and constancy of this feeling will be recognized.

That he had not the grave deportment of a councillor is very evident. Imagine him, as in this anecdote related by Gleim : ‘Soon after Goethe had written Werther I came to Weimar, and wished to know him. I had brought with me the last Musen Almanach, a literary novelty, and read here and there a poem to the company in which I passed the evening. While I was reading, a young man, booted and spurred, in a short green shooting-jacket thrown open, came in and mingled with the audience. I had scarcely remarked his entrance. He sat down opposite to me and listened attentively. I scarcely knew what there was about him that particularly struck me, except a pair of brilliant black Italian eyes. But it was decreed that I should know more of him.

* Menzel, ccxli.

‘During a short pause, in which some gentlemen and ladies were discussing the merits of the pieces I had read, lauding some and censuring others, the gallant young sportsman (for such I took him to be) arose from his chair, and bowing with a most courteous and ingratiating air to me, offered to relieve me from time to time in reading, lest I should be tired. I could do no less than accept so polite an offer, and immediately handed him the book. But oh! Apollo and all ye Muses — not forgetting the Graces — what was I then to hear? At first, indeed, things went on smoothly enough :

Die Zephyr’n lauschten,
Die Bäche rauschten,
Die Sonne
Verbreitet, ihre Licht mit Wonne —

the somewhat more solid, substantial fare of Voss, Stolberg, and Bürger was delivered in such a manner that no one had any reason to complain.

‘All at once, however, it was as if some wild and wanton devil had taken possession of the young reader, and I thought I saw the Wild Huntsman bodily before me. He read poems that had no existence in the Almanach ; broke out into all possible modes and dialects. Hexameters, Iambics, doggerel verses one after another, or blended in strange confusion, came tumbling out in torrents. What wild and humorous fancies did he not combine that evening! Amidst them came such noble, magnificent thoughts, thrown in detached and flitting, that the authors to whom he ascribed them must have thanked God on their knees if they had fallen upon their desks.

‘As soon as the joke was discovered, universal merriment spread through the room. He put everybody present out of countenance in one way or the other. Even my Mæcenasship, which I had always regarded it as a sort of duty to exercise towards young authors, poets and artists, had its turn. Though he praised it highly on the one side, he did not forget to insinuate on the other that I claimed a sort of property in the individuals to whom I afforded support and countenance. In a little fable composed extempore in doggerel verses, he likened me wittily enough to a worthy and most enduring turkey hen that sits on a great heap of eggs of her own and other people's, and hatches them with infinite patience; but to whom it sometimes happens to have a chalk egg put under her instead of a real one: a trick at which she takes no offence.

“‘That is either Goethe or the Devil!’” cried I to Wieland, who sat opposite me. “Both,” he replied.’

It is worth bearing in mind what the young Goethe was, that we may the better understand the reason of what he became. No sooner had he commenced his career as politician, than he began to tone down the extravagance of his demeanor; without foregoing any enjoyments, he tried to accord more with those in whom a staid demeanor was necessitated by their more flagging pulses of lethargic life. One month after his appointment Wieland writes of him: ‘Goethe did in truth, during the first months of his visit here, scandalize most people (never me); but from the moment that he decided on becoming a man of business, he has conducted himself with blameless σωφροσύνη and all worldly prudence.’ Elsewhere he says: ‘Goethe, with all his real and apparent sauvagerie, has, in his little finger, more conduite and savoir faire than all the court parasites, Boniface sneaks, and political cobweb-spinners have in their whole bodies and souls. So long as Karl August lives no power can remove him.’

As we familiarize ourselves with the details of this episode, there appears less and less plausibility in the often iterated declamation against Goethe on the charge of his having ‘sacrificed his genius to the court.’ It becomes indeed a singularly foolish display of rhetoric. Let us for a moment consider the charge. He had to choose a career. That of poet was then, even more than now, impossible ; verse could create fame, but no money : fama and fames were then, as ever, in terrible contiguity. As soon as the necessity for a career is admitted, much objection falls to the ground ; for those who reproach him with having wasted his time on court festivities, and the duties of government, which others could have done as well, must ask whether he would have saved that time had he followed the career of jurisprudence, and jostled the lawyers through the courts at Frankfurt ? or would they prefer seeing him reduced to the condition of poor Schiller, wasting so much of his precious life in literary ‘hackwork,’ translating French books for a miserable pittance ? Time, in any case, would have been claimed ; in return for that given to Karl August, he received, as he confesses in a poem addressed to the Duke, ‘what the great seldom bestow — affection, leisure, confidence, garden and house. No one have I had to thank but him ; and much have I wanted, who, as a poet, ill-understood the arts of gain. If Europe praised me, what has Europe done for me ? Nothing. Even my works have been an expense to me.’

In 1801, writing to his mother on the complaints uttered against him by those who judged so falsely of his condition, he says they only saw what he gave up, not what he gained — they could not comprehend how he grew daily richer, though he daily gave up so much. He confesses that the narrow circle of a burgher life would have ill-accorded with his ardent and wide-sweeping spirit. Had he remained at Frankfurt he would have been ignorant of the world. But here the panorama of life was unrolled before him, and his experience was every way enlarged. Did not Leonardo da Vinci spend much of his time charming the court of Milan with his poetry and lute-playing? did he not also spend time in mechanical and hydrostatical labors for the state? No reproach is lifted against his august name; no one cries out against his being false to his genius; no one rebukes him for having painted so little at one period. The 'Last Supper' speaks for him. Will not Tasso, Iphigenia, Hermann und Dorothea, Faust, Meister, and the long list of Goethe's works, speak for him?

I have dwelt mainly on the dissipation of his time, because the notion that a court life affected his genius by 'corrupting his mind' is preposterous. No reader of this biography, it is to be hoped, will fail to see the true relations in which he stood to the Duke; how free they were from anything like servility, or suppression of genuine impulse. Indeed, one of the complaints against him, according to the unexceptionable authority of Riemer, was that made by the subalterns, 'of his not being sufficiently attentive to court etiquette.' To say, as Niebuhr says, that the 'court was a Delilah to which he sacrificed his locks,' is profoundly to misunderstand his genius, profoundly to misread his life. Had his genius been of that stormy class which produces great Reformers and great Martyrs — had it been his mission to agitate mankind by words which, reverberating to their inmost recesses, called them to lay down their lives in the service of an Idea — had it been his tendency to meditate upon the far-off destinies of man, and sway men by the coercion of grand representative abstractions — then, indeed, we might say his place was aloof from the motley throng, and not in sailing down the swiftly-flowing stream to sounds of mirth and music on the banks. But he was not a Reformer, not a Martyr. He was a Poet, whose religion was Beauty, whose worship was of Nature, whose aim was Culture. His mission was to paint Life, and for that it was requisite he should see Life, to know

‘The haunt and the main region of his song.’

Happier circumstances might indeed have surrounded him, and given him a greater sphere. It would have been very different, as he often felt, if there had been a Nation to appeal to, instead of a heterogeneous mass of small peoples, willing enough to talk of Fatherland, but in no-wise prepared to become a Nation. There are many other ifs in which much virtue could be found ; but inasmuch as he could not create circumstances, we must follow his example, and be content with what the gods provided. I do not, I confess, see what other sphere was open to him in which his genius could have been more sacred ; but I do see that he built out of circumstance a noble Temple in which the altar-flame burnt with a steady light. To hypothetical biographers he left the task of settling what Goethe might have been ; enough for us to catch some glimpse of what he was.

‘Poetry,’ Carlyle profoundly says, ‘is the attempt which man makes to render his existence harmonious.’ It is the flower into which a life expands, but it is not the life itself, with all daily needs, daily struggles, daily prosaisms. The true poet manfully accepts the condition in which destiny has placed him, and therein tries to make his existence harmonious ; the sham poet, like a weak workman fretful with his tools, is loud in assurances of what he might be, were it his lot to live in other circumstances. Goethe was led by the current of events to a little court, where he was arrested by friendship, love, leisure, and opportunities of a freer, nobler life than Frankfurt Law Courts offered him. After much deliberation he chose his career : these pages will show how in it he contrived to be true to his genius.

It is scarcely worth while to notice trash about his ‘servility’ and ‘court slavery.’ He was not required to be servile ; and his nature was as proud as any prince’s. ‘They call me a prince’s servant,’ he said to Eckermann, ‘and a prince’s slave ; as if there were any meaning in such words ! Whom do I serve ? A tyrant — a despot ? Do I serve one who lives for his own pleasures at the people’s cost ? Such princes and such times are, thank God ! far enough from us. For more than half a century I have been connected in the closest relations with the Grand Duke, and for half a century have striven and toiled with him ; but I should not be speaking truth were I to say that I could name a single day on which the Duke had not his thoughts busied with something to be devised and effected for the good of the country ; something calculated to better the condition of each individual in it. As for himself, personally, what has his princely state given him but a burden and a task ? Is his dwelling, or his dress, or his table more sumptuously provided than that of any private man in easy circumstances ? Go into our maritime cities, and you will find the larder and cellar of every considerable merchant better filled than his. If, then, I am a prince’s slave, it is at least my consolation that I am but the slave of one who is himself a slave of the general good.’

And to close this subject, read the following passage from Merck’s letter to Nicolai — (the Merck who is said by Falk to have spoken so bitterly of the waste of Goethe’s life at Weimar): 'I have lately paid Goethe a visit at the Wartburg, and we have lived together for ten days like children. I am delighted to have seen with my own eyes what his situation is. The Duke is the best of all, and has a character firm as iron: I would do, for love of him, just what Goethe does. . . . I tell you sincerely that the Duke is most worthy of respect, and one of the cleverest men that I have ever seen, — and consider that he is a Prince, and only twenty years of age!' The long and friendly correspondence Merck kept up with the Duke is the best pledge that the foregoing judgment was sincere.

CHAPTER IV.

THE FRAU VON STEIN.

FROM out the many flirtations that amused him, there rises one which grew into predominant importance, swallowing up all the others, and leaping from lambent flame into eager and passionate fire. It was no transitory flash, but a fire which burnt for ten years, and thereby is distinguished from all previous attachments. It is a silver thread woven among the many-colored threads which formed the tapestry of his life. I will here detach it, to consider it by itself.

The Baroness von Stein, ‘Hofdame,’ and wife of the Master of the Horse, was, both by family and position, a considerable person. To us she is interesting, as having sprung from a Scotch family, named Irving, and as being the sister-in-law to that Baron Imhoff, who sold his first wife to Warren Hastings. She was the mother of seven children, and had reached that age which, in fascinating women, is of perilous fascination — the age of three-and-thirty. We can understand something of her power if we look at her portrait, and imagine those delicate, coquettish features animated with the lures of sensibility, gayety, and experience of the world. She sang well, played well, sketched well, talked well, appreciated poetry, and handled sentiment with the delicate tact of a woman of the world. Her pretty fingers had turned over many a serious book ; and she knew how to gather honey from weeds. With moral deficiencies, which this history will betray, she was to all acquaintances a perfectly charming woman ; and retained her charm even in old age, as many living witnesses testify. Some years after her first acquaintance with Goethe, Schiller thus writes of her to his friend Körner : ‘ She is really a genuine, interesting person, and I quite understand what has attached Goethe to her. Beautiful she can never have been ; but her countenance has a soft earnestness, and a quite peculiar openness. A healthy understanding, truth and feeling, lie in her nature. She has more than a thousand letters from Goethe ; and from Italy he writes to her every week. They say the connection is perfectly pure and blameless.’

It was at Pymont that Goethe first saw the Frau von Stein’s portrait, and was three nights sleepless in consequence of Zimmermann’s description of her. In sending her that flattering detail, Zimmermann added, ‘ he will assuredly come to Weimar to see you.’ Under her portrait Goethe wrote, ‘ What a glorious poem it would be to see how the world mirrors itself in this soul ! She sees the world as it is, and yet withal sees it through the medium of love ; hence sweetness is the dominant expression.’ In her reply to Zimmermann, she begs to hear more about Goethe, and intimates her desire to see him. This calls forth a reply that she ‘ has no idea of the danger of his magical presence.’ Such dangers pretty women gladly run into, especially when, like Charlotte von Stein, they are perfect mistresses of themselves.

Tearing himself away from Lili, his heart still trembling from the agitations of a victory over its desires, he saw this charming woman. The earth continues warm long after the sun has glided below the horizon ; and the heart continues warm some time after the departure of its sun. Goethe was therefore prepared to fall desperately in love with one who 'viewed all things through the medium of love.' And there is considerable interest in noting the kind of idol now selected. Hitherto he has been captivated only by very young girls, whose youth, beauty, and girlishness, were the charms to his wandering fancy; but now he is fascinated by a woman, a woman of rank and elegance, a woman of culture and experience, a woman who, instead of abandoning herself to the charm of his affection, knew how, without descending from her pedestal, to keep the flame alive. /The others loved him, — showed him their love, — and were forgotten./ She contrived to keep him in the pleasant fever of hope, made herself necessary to him, made her love an aim, and kept him in the excitement of one

‘Who never is, but always to be blest.’

Considering the state of society and opinion at that period, and considering moreover that, according to her son's narrative, her husband was scarcely seen in his own home more than once a week, and that no pretence of affection existed between them, we can understand how Goethe's notorious passion for her excited sympathy in Weimar. Not a word of blame escaped any one on this subject. They saw a lover whose mistress gave him just enough encouragement to keep him eager in pursuit, and who knew how to check him when that eagerness would press on too far. In his early letters to her there are sudden outbreaks and reserves; sometimes the affectionate thou escapes, and the next day, perhaps even in the next sentence, the prescribed you returns. These letters follow almost daily. So early as January, 1776, this significant phrase escapes: ‘Adieu, angel! I shall never become more prudent; and have to thank God for it. Adieu! and yet it grieves me that I love thee so — and precisely thee!’

Here is an answer, apparently, to something she has written (for unhappily we have none<sup>a</sup> of her letters: she had taken the precaution to demand her letters back from him, and burnt them, carefully preserving his!):

‘Wherefore must I plague thee! dearest creature! Wherefore deceive myself and plague thee! We can be nothing to each other, and yet are too much to each other. Believe me thou art in all things one with me — but because I see things as they are it makes me mad! Good night, angel, and good morning. I will see thee no more . . . Only . . . Thou knowest all . . . My heart is . . . All I can say is mere folly. In future I shall see thee as men see the stars.’ A few days after, he writes, ‘Adieu, dear sister, since it must be so.’

I select the following as indicating the tone:

‘1st May. To-day I shall not see you. Your presence yesterday made so wonderful an impression on me, that I know not as yet whether I am well or ill from it. Adieu, dearest lady.’

‘1st May. Evening. Thou art right to make me a saint, that is to say, to remove me from thy heart. Holy as thou art, I cannot make thee a saint. To-morrow, therefore . . . Well, I will not see thee. Good night!’

On the 24th May, a passionate letter reveals that she had written or spoken to him in a decided tone about ‘appearances’ and the ‘world’:

‘So the purest, most beautiful, truest relation I ever had to a woman, except to my sister, that also must be disturbed! I was prepared for it; but I suffered infinitely on account of the past and the future, and of the poor child thus consecrated in sorrow. I will not see you;

your presence would make me sad. If I am not to live with you, your love will help me no more than the love of those absent, in which I am so rich. Presence, in the moment of need, discerns, alleviates and strengthens. The absent comes with the hose when the fire is extinguished — and all for the sake of the world! The world, which can be nothing to me, will not let thee be anything to me. You know not what you do . . . 'The hand of one in solitude who hears not the voice of love, presses hard where it rests. Adieu, best of women!'

'25th May. You are always the same, always infinite love and goodness. Forgive me if I make you suffer. I will learn to bear my suffering alone.'

'2d June. Adieu. Love me as ever, I will come seldomer and write seldomer.'

'4th June. Here, dear lady, is the tribute. I will see if I can keep my resolution not to come. You are not quite safe with me. Yesterday there were again some moments in which I truly felt how I love you.'

'6th June. So you could do me the unkindness of remaining away yesterday. Truly what you do must be right in my eyes!! But it made me sad.'

'7th June. You are a darling to have told me all! When one loves one should tell everything. Dearest angel, and I have again three words which will set you at rest, but only words from me to thee! I shall come to-day.'

She was forced to quit Weimar for a while. 'Dearest lady,' he writes, 'I dare not think you are going away on Tuesday, and that you will be away from me six months. For what avails all else? It is presence alone which influences, consoles and edifies! even though it sometimes torments — torment is the sunshower of love.'

Here is a curious passage: 'Last night as I lay in my bed half asleep, Philip brought me a letter ; half stupefied, I read — that Lili is betrothed !! I turn round and fall asleep. How I pray that fate may act so by me in the right moment. Dear angel, good night.'

One more extract. 'Oh ! you have a way of giving pain which is like that of destiny, which admits of no complaint, however it may grieve.'

In a little while the tone grows more subdued. Just as the tone of his behavior in Weimar, after the first wild weeks, became softened to a lower key, so in these letters we see, after a while, fewer passionate outbreaks, fewer interjections, and no more thou's. But love warms them still. The letters are incessant, and show an incessant pre-occupation. Certain sentimental readers will be shocked, perhaps, to find so many details about eating and drinking ; but when they remember Charlotte cutting bread and butter, they may understand the author of Werther eloquently begging his beloved to send him a sausage.

CHAPTER V.

THE GARTENHAUS.

THE visitor may still read the inscription, at once homage and souvenir, by which Goethe connected the happy hours of love with the happy hours of active solitude passed in his Garden House in the Park. Fitly is the place dedicated to the Frau von Stein. The whole spot speaks of her. Here are the flower-beds from which almost every morning flowers, with the dew still on them, came with letters, as fresh and beautiful, to greet the beloved. Here are the beds from which came the asparagus he was so proud to send her. Here is the orchard in which grew the fruit so often sent. Here is the room in which he dreamt of her; here the room in which he worked, while her image hovered around him. The house stands within twenty minutes' walk from the house where she lived, separated by clusters of noble trees.

If the reader turns back to the description of the Park (page 325), he will ascertain the position of this Gartenhaus. Originally it belonged to Bertuch. One day when the Duke was earnestly pressing Goethe to take up his residence at Weimar, the poet (who then lived in the Jägerhaus in the Belvedere Allée), undecided as to whether he should go or remain, let fall, among other excuses, the want of a quiet bit of land, where his taste for gardening could be indulged. 'Bertuch, for example, is very comfortable ; if I had but such a bit of ground as that !' Hereupon the Duke, very characteristically, goes to Bertuch, and without periphrasis, says, 'I must have your garden.' Bertuch starts : 'But your highness —' 'But me no buts,' replies the young prince ; 'I can't help you. Goethe wants it, and unless we give it to him we shall never keep him here ; it is the only way to secure him.' This reason would probably not have been so cogent with Bertuch, had not the Duke excused the despotism of his act by giving in exchange a much more valuable house and grounds. In a few days Goethe received the Garden House as the gift of his princely friend.

It is charmingly situated, and, although of modest pretensions, is one of the most enviable houses in Weimar. The Ilm runs through the meadows which front it. The town, although so near, is completely shut out from view by the thick-growing trees. The solitude is absolute, broken only by the occasional sound of the church clock, the music from the barracks, and the screaming of the peacocks spreading their superb beauty in the park. So fond was Goethe of this house, that winter and summer he lived there for seven years ; and when in 1782, the Duke made him a present of the house in the Frauenplan, he could not prevail upon himself to sell the Gartenhaus, but continued to make it a favorite retreat. Often when he chose to be alone and undisturbed, he locked all the gates of the bridges which led from the town to his house, so that, as Wieland complained, no one could get at him except by aid of picklock and crowbar.

It was here, in this little garden, he studied the development of plants, and made many of those experiments and observations which have given him a high rank among the Discoverers in Science. It was here the poet escaped from court. It was here the lover was happy in his love.

How modest this Garden-house really is ; how far removed from any thing like one's preconceptions of it ! It is true that the position is one which many a rich townsman in England would be glad of, as the site for a handsome villa : a pretty orchard and garden on a gentle slope ; in front, a good carriage road, running beside a fine meadow encircled by the stately trees of the park. But the house, a half-pay captain with us would consider a miserable cottage ; yet it sufficed for the court-favorite and minister. Here the Duke was constantly with him ; sitting up, till deep in the night, in earnest discussion, often sleeping on the sofa instead of going home. Here both Duke and Duchess would come and dine with him, in the most simple, unpretending way, the whole banquet in one instance consisting, as we learn from a casual phrase in the Stein correspondence, of 'a beer-soup and a little cold meat.'

There is something very pleasant in noticing these traits of the simplicity which was then practised. The Duke's own hut — the Borkenhaus — has already been described (page 326). The hut, for it was nothing else, in which Goethe lived in the Ilmenau mountains, and the more than bourgeois simplicity of the Garden House, make one aware of one thing among others, namely, that if he sacrificed his genius to a court, it assuredly was not for loaves and fishes, not for luxury, or material splendor of any kind. Indeed, such things had no temptation for his simple tastes. 'Rich in money,' he writes to his beloved, 'I shall never become ; but, therefore, all the richer in Confidence, Good Name and Influence over the minds of men.'

It was his love of Nature which made him so indifferent to luxury. That love gave him simplicity and hardihood. In many things he was unlike his nation — notably in his voluntary exposure to two bright, wholesome things, which to his contemporaries were little less than bugbears—I mean, fresh air and cold water. The nation which consented to live in the atmosphere of iron stoves, tobacco, and bad breath, and which deemed a pint of water all that man could desire for his ablutions, must have been greatly perplexed at seeing Goethe indulge in fresh air and cold water as if they were vices.

Two anecdotes will bring this contrast into relief. So great was the German reluctance to even a necessary exposure to the inclemencies of open air exercise, that historians inform us ‘a great proportion, especially among the learned classes, employed a miserable substitute for exercise in the shape of a machine, by means of which they comfortably took their dose of movement without leaving their rooms.’* And Jacobs, in his Personalien, records a fact which, while explaining how the above-named absurdity could have gained ground, paints a sad picture of the life of German youth in those days. Describing his boyish days at Gotha, he says: ‘Our winter pleasures were confined to a not very spacious courtyard, exchanged in summer for a little garden within the walls, which my father hired. We took no walks. Only once a year, when the harvest was ripe, our parents took us out to spend an evening in the fields.† So little had Goethe of this prejudice against fresh air, that when he began the rebuilding of his Gartenhaus, instead of sleeping at an hotel or at the house of a friend, he lived there through all the building period, and we find him writing. ‘At last I have a window once more, and can make a fire.’ On the 3d of May he writes, ‘Good morning: here is asparagus. How were you yesterday? Philip baked me a cake; and thereupon, wrapped up in my blue cloak, I laid myself on a dry corner of the terrace and slept amid thunder, lightning and rain, so gloriously that my bed was afterwards quite disagreeable.' On the 19th he writes, 'Thanks for the breakfast. I send you something in return. Last night I slept on the terrace, wrapped in my blue cloak, awoke three times, at 12, 2 and 4, and — each time there was a new splendor in the heavens.' — There are other traces of this tendency to bivouac, but these will suffice. He bathed not only in the morning sunlight, but also when the moonlight shimmered on the Ilm. Always in the free air seeking vigor —

* Biedermanin: Deutschland's Politische Materielle und Sociale Zustände, i. p. 343.

† Quoted by Mrs. Austin: Germany from 1760 to 1814, p. 85.

“Tauche mich in die Sonne früh Bad' ab im Monde des Tages Müh.”

The Duke shared this love of bathing, which December's cold could not arrest. It was here Goethe learned to swim by the aid of 'corks' (which so often served him as an illustration), and no inclemency of the weather could keep him out of the water. The fascination of water luring into its treacherous depths, is wonderfully expressed by him in that ballad, which every one knows, and almost every one tries to translate. I have tried my hand in this version :

THE FISHERMAN.

The water rushed, the water swelled :
A fisherman sat by,
And gazed upon his dancing float
With tranquil-dreaming eye.
And as he sits, and as he looks,
The gurgling waves arise :
A maid, all bright with water-drops,
Stands straight before his eyes.

She sang to him, she spake to him :
‘ My fish why dost thou snare
With human wit and human guile
Into the killing air ?
Couldst see how happy fishes live
Under the stream so clear,
Thyself would plunge into the stream,
And live forever there.

‘ Bathe not the lovely sun and moon
Within the cool deep sea,
And with wave-breathing faces rise
In two-fold witchery ?
Lure not the misty heaven-deeps
So beautiful and blue ?
Lures not thine image, mirrored in
The fresh eternal dew ? ’

The water rushed, the water swelled,
It clasped his feet, I wis ;
A thrill went through his yearning heart
As when two lovers kiss !
She spake to him, she sang to him :
Resistless was her strain ;
Half drew him in, half lured him in ;
He ne’er was seen again.

There is an anecdote which must find a place here. One night, while the moon was calmly shining on our poetical bather, a peasant, returning home, was in the act of climbing over the bars of the floating bridge ; Goethe espied him, and moved by that spirit of devilry which so often startled Weimar, he gave utterance to wild sepulchral tones, raised himself half out of water, ducked under, and reappeared howling, to the horror of the aghast peasant, who, hearing such sounds issue from a figure with long floating hair, fled as if a legion of devils were at hand. To this day there remains an ineradicable belief in the existence of the water-sprite who howls among the waters of the Ilm.

CHAPTER VI.

PRIVATE THEATRICALS.

‘LET my present life,’ writes Goethe to Lavater, January, 1777, ‘continue as long as it will, at any rate I have heartily enjoyed a genuine experience of the variegated throng and press of the world — Sorrow, Hope, Love, Work, Wants, Adventure, Ennui, Impatience, Folly, Joy, the Expected and the Unknown, the Superficial and the Profound — just as the dice threw — with fêtes, dances, sledgings — adorned in silk and spangles — a marvellous ménage ! And withal, dear brother, God be praised, in myself and in my real aims in life, I am quite happy.’

‘Goethe plays indeed a high game at Weimar,’ writes Merck, ‘but lives at Court after his own fashion. The Duke is an excellent man, let them say what they will, and in Goethe’s company will become still more so. What you hear is Court scandal and lies. It is true the intimacy between master and servant is very great, but what harm is there in that ? Were Goethe a nobleman it would be thought quite right. He is the soul and direction of everything, and all are contented with him, because he serves many and injures no one. Who can withstand the disinterestedness of this man ?’

He had begun to make his presence felt in the serious department of affairs ; not only in educating the Duke who had chosen him as his friend, but also in practical ameliorations. He had induced the Duke to call Herder to Weimar, as Hof Prediger (Court chaplain) and General-superintendent; whereat Weimar grumbled, and gossiped, setting afloat stories of Herder having mounted the pulpit in boots and spurs. Not content with these efforts in a higher circle, Goethe sought to improve the condition of the people; and among his plans we note one for the opening of the Ilmenau mines, which for so many years had been left untouched.

Amusement went hand in hand with business. Among the varied amusements, one, which greatly occupied his time and fancy, deserves a more special notice, because it will give us a glimpse of the Court, and will also show us how the poet turned sport into profit. I allude to the Private Theatricals which were started shortly after his arrival. It should be premised that the theatre was still in ashes from the fire of 1774. Seyler had carried his troupe of players elsewhere; and Weimar was without its stage. Just at this period Private Theatricals were even more 'the rage,' than they are in England at present. In Berlin, Dresden, Frankfurt, Augsburg, Nüremberg and Fulda, were celebrated amateur troupes. In Würtzburg, for a long while, a noble company put on sock and buskin; in Eisenach, Prince and Court joined in the sport. Even the Universities, which in earlier times had, from religious scruples, denounced the drama, now forgot their antagonism, and in Vienna, Halle, Göttingen and Jena, allowed the students to have private stages.

The Weimar theatre surpassed them all. It had its poets, Goethe, Einsiedel, etc.; its composers, its scene painters, its costumiers. Whoever showed any talent for recitation, singing, or dancing, was pressed into service, and had to work as hard as if his bread depended on it. The almost daily rehearsals of drama, opera, or ballet, occupied and delighted men and women glad to have something to do. The troupe was distinguished: the Duchess Amalia, Karl August, Prince Constantine, Bode, Knebel, Einsiedel, Musæus, Seckendorf, Bertuch and Goethe; with Corona Schröter, Kotzebue's sister Amalia, and Fräulein Göchhausen. These formed a curious strolling company, wandering from Weimar to all the palaces in the neighborhood — Ettersburg, Tiefurt, Belvedere, even to Jena, Dornburg and Ilmenau. Often did Bertuch, as Falk tells us, receive orders to have the sumpter wagon, or travelling kitchen, ready for the early dawn, when the Court would start with its wandering troupe. If only a short expedition was intended, three sumpter asses were sufficient. If it was more distant, over hill and dale, far into the distant country, then indeed the night before was a busy one, and all the ducal pots and pans were in requisition. Such boiling and stewing and roasting! such slaughter of capons, pigeons and fowls! The ponds of the Ilm were dragged for fish; the woods were robbed of their partridges; the cellars were lightened of their wines. With early dawn rode forth the merry party, full of anticipation, wild with animal spirits. On they went through solitudes, the grand old trees of which were wont only to see the soaring hawk poised above their tops, or the wild-eyed deer bounding past the hut of the charcoal burner. On they went: youth, beauty, gladness and hope, a goodly train, like that which animated the forest of Ardennes, when 'under the shade of melancholy boughs' the pensive Duke and his followers forgot awhile their cares and 'painted pomps.'

Their stage was soon arranged. At Ettersburg the traces are still visible of this forest stage, where, when weather permitted, the performances took place. A wing of the chateau was also made into a theatre. But the open-air performances were most relished. To rehearsals and performances in Ettersburg the actors, sometimes as many as twenty, were brought in the Duke's equipages; and in the evening, after a joyous supper, often enlivened with songs, they were conducted home by the Duke's body-guard of Hussars bearing torches. It was here they performed Einsiedel's opera, The Gypsies, with wonderful illusion. Several scenes of Götz von Berlichingen were woven into it. The illuminated trees, the crowd of gypsies in the wood, the dances and songs under the blue starlit heavens, while the sylvan bugle sounded from afar, made up a picture, the magic of which was never forgotten. On the Ilm also, at Tiefurt, just where the river makes a beautiful bend round the shore, a regular theatre was constructed. Trees, and other natural objects, such as fishermen, nixies, water-sprites, moon and stars, — all were introduced with effect. U

The performances were of the same varied nature as the theatres. Sometimes French comedies, sometimes serious works of art, often broad extravaganzas. Occasionally they played charades, in which the plan was pre-arranged, but the dialogue left to the improvisation of the actors. Once when, as improvisatores are apt to become, an actor grew wordy and wandering, they rushed on the stage, carried him off by force, and informed the audience (as if it were a part of the piece) that he was suddenly taken ill. The records of that time have preserved for us the outline of a magical piece, got up in honor of Goethe's birthday — Minerva's Birth, Life and Deeds. It was a magnificent magic-lantern piece, with music by Seckendorf. The characters were not represented by puppets, but by gentlemen and ladies in the so-called Petit Colisée at Tiefurt. On the site of this new temple of the Muses stood formerly a solitary wood hut. In the representation every appliance was sought after which eternal effect demanded. It took place behind a large white curtain en silhoutte. In the Histoire universelle des Théâtres there is only one example of a theatrical representation of this kind, namely, the drama which Chiron presented to his pupil, Achilles, and which had the same object and significance as the Tiefert drama. In antiquity such representations were called umbræ palpitantes, by moderns, ombres chinoises. They were introduced at the Weimar Court about this time, by the Duke George of Saxe-Meiningen, and were very much in favor there.

The subject of this Tiefert piece is remarkable : Jupiter (in the person of the painter Kraus, on whose shoulders was placed a colossal paste-board head), in order to frustrate the prophecy that on the accouchement of his wife Metis, he would be thrust from the throne, has devoured Metis. Thereupon he suffers terrible pains in the head; Ganymede, hovering behind him on a great eagle, offers him the cup of nectar: the pains of the Thunderer increase visibly, and Ganymede soars into the air to fetch Æsculapius and Vulcan. Æsculapius seeks in vain to cure his master. A Cyclops, who is summoned, bleeds him at the nose, without effect. Then comes the powerful Vulcan (represented by the young Duke Karl August), who, holding in one hand his hammer, in the other a great iron bar, and encircled by an apron, approaches his suffering father, and with one good stroke of the hammer splits his divine skull, out of which proceeds Minerva, the goddess of wisdom (represented by Corona Schröter), at first quite a small figure, but by means of appropriate machinery becoming larger and larger every moment, till at last the whole of her tall, slim form is revealed, enveloped in light gauze. She is received by Father Zeus in the most friendly manner; and rich gifts are presented to her by all the gods. She is furnished with a helmet, an ægis, and a lance; Ganymede places Jupiter's owl at her feet, and amidst music and choral singing the curtain falls.

In the third and last act, the poet had departed from the materials of the myth. He made the new-born goddess read in the Book of Fate, and find there the 28th of August * marked as one of the most fortunate days. She says that 'on that day three-and-thirty years ago a man was given to the world, who will be honored as one of the best and wisest.' Then appears a winged genius in the clouds, bearing Goethe's name. Minerva crowns this name, and at the same time dedicates to it the divine gifts which have been immemorially the tokens of her favor; for example, the golden lyre of Apollo, and the flowery wreath of the Muses. The whip of Momus alone, on the thong of which stood the word 'Aves,' is laid aside and rejected by the goddess; while the names Iphigenia and Faust appear in the clouds in fire transparencies. At the close, Momus advances unabashed, and brings the reprobated symbol of his Art as a present to Goethe.

Such was the opening and dedication of the new Weimar-Tiefurt Court Theatre. It is obvious that the piece was intended purely to celebrate the birthday of Goethe, the director of this social theatre; and gives us not a bad idea of the ingenuity and pains bestowed upon these amusements. The reader will not fail to notice that if Goethe prepared fêtes for the birthday of his Duchess, Weimar also prepared fêtes for the birthday of its poet.

Another favorite magic-lantern piece was King Midas, which is mentioned in Amalia's letters to Knebel in the year 1781. But the best known of the Tiefurt dramas is Goethe's Operetta Die Fischerin, performed in the summer of 1782. The charming text, beginning with the famous Erl-König, is preserved in Goethe's works. The piece was represented in the Tiefurt park, partly on the bank of the Ilm near the bridge, partly on the Ilm itself, which was illuminated with numerous torches and lamps. Under lofty alders against the river were placed scattered huts of fishermen; nets, boats and fishing implements stood around. On Dortchen's (Corona Schröter) hearth fire was burning. At the moment in which the fishermen, who had been called together, lighted their strips of wood and torches, and spread themselves with their brilliant lights in boats and on the banks of the river, to search for the lost maiden, the light flashed suddenly up from the necks of land which stretched forward into the Ilm, illuminating the nearest objects, and showing their reflection in the water, while the more distant groups of trees and hills lay in deep night. The spectators had assembled in great numbers, and as they crowded on the wooden bridge, the better to catch the magical effect of the illumination on the water, their weight crushed the bridge in, and the eager gazers fell into the river. No one, however, was injured. The involuntary bathers were heartily laughed at, and the accident was regarded as an amusing interlude.

* Goethe's birthday.

I find further that when the 'Birds' of Aristophanes was performed at Ettersburg, the actors were all dressed in real feathers, their heads completely covered, though free to move. Their wings flapped, their eyes rolled, and ornithology was absurdly parodied. It is right to add, that besides these extravagances and ombres chinoises, there were very serious dramatic efforts: among them we find Goethe's second dramatic attempt, Die Mitschuldigen, which was thus cast:

Alceste	. . . . .	Goethe.
Söller	. . . . .	Bertuch.
Der Wirth	. . . . .	Musäus.
Sophie	. . . . .	Corona Schröter.

Little did the Leipsic student, when writing that comedy, imagine he would one day perform it at the court of Weimar! Another play was the Geschwister, written in three eyenings, it is said out of love for the sweet eyes of Amalia Kotzebue, sister of the dramatist, then a youth. Kotzebue thus touches the point in his Memoirs: ‘Goethe had at that time just written his charming piece, Die Geschwister. It was performed at a private theatre at Weimar, he himself playing William and my sister Mariane — while to me, yes to me — was allotted the important part of postillion! My readers may imagine with what exultation I trod the stage for the first time before the mighty public itself.’ Another piece was Cumberland’s West Indian, in which the Duke played Major O’Flaherty, Eckhoff (the great actor) the Father, and Goethe Belcour, dressed in a white coat with silver lace, blue silk vest, and blue silk knee breeches, in which they say he looked superb.

While mentioning these, I must not pass over the Iphigenia (then in prose), which was thus cast:

Orestes	. . . . .	Goethe.
Pylades	. . . . .	Prince Constantine.
Thoas	. . . . .	Knebel.
Arkas	. . . . .	Seidler.
Iphigenia	. . . . .	Corona Schröter.

‘Never shall I forget,’ exclaims Dr. Hufeland, ‘the impression Goethe made as Orestes, in his Grecian costume; one might have fancied him Apollo. Never before had there been seen such union of physical and intellectual beauty in one man!’ His acting, as far as I can learn, had the ordinary defects of amateur acting; it was impetuous and yet stiff, exaggerated and yet cold; and his fine sonorous voice displayed itself without nice reference to shades of meaning. In comic parts, on the other hand, he seems to have been excellent; the broader the fun, the more at home he felt; and one can imagine the rollicking animal spirits with which he animated the Marktschreier in the Plundersweiler; one can picture him in that extravagance of the Gepflichtes Braut,* giving vent to his sarcasm on the 'sentimental' tone of the age, ridiculing his own Werther, and merciless to Woldemar.†

I have thus brought together, irrespective of dates, the scattered indications of these theatrical amusements. How much enjoyment was produced by them! what social pleasure! and what endless episodes to which memory recurred in after times, when seated round the dinner table! Nor were these amusements profitless. Wilhelm Meister was designed and partly written about this period, and the reader who knows Goethe's tendency to make all his works biographical, will not be surprised at the amount of theatrical experience which is mirrored in that work; nor at the earnestness which is there made to lurk beneath amusement, so that what to the crowd seems no more than a flattery of their tastes, is to the man himself a process of the highest culture.

Boar-hunting in the light of early dawn, sitting in the middle of the day in grave diplomacy and active council, rehearsing during the afternoon, and enlivening the evening with grotesque serenades or torchlight sledgings — thus passed many of his days ; not to mention flirtations, balls, masquerades, concerts and verse-writing. The muse was, however, somewhat silent, though Hans Sachs' poetische Sendung, Lila, some charming lyrics, and the dramas and operas written for the occasion, forbid the accusation of idleness. He was storing up materials. Faust, Egmont, Tasso, Iphigenia and Meister were germinating.

* Published under a very mitigated form, as the Triumph der Empfindsamkeit. See the next chapter for further notice of this piece.

† Jacobi and Wieland were both seriously offended with his parodies of their writings; but both soon became reconciled to him.

The muse was silent, but was the soul inactive ? As these strange and variegated scenes passed before his eyes, was he a mere actor, and not also a spectator ? Let his works answer. To some indeed it has seemed as if in thus lowering great faculties to the composition of slight operas and festive pieces, Goethe was faithless to his mission, false to his own genius. This is but a repetition of Merck's exclamation against Clavigo, and may be answered from the same point of view. Herder thought that the Chosen One should devote himself to great works. This is the pedantry of a man of letters who can conceive no other aim than the production of great works. But Goethe needed to live as well as to write. Life is multiplied and rendered infinite by Feeling and Knowledge. He sought both to feel and to know. The great works he has written — works vast in conception, austere grand in execution, the fruits of earnest toil and lonely self-seclusion — ought to shield him now from any charge of wasting his time on frivolities, though to Herder and Merck such a point of view was denied.

It was his real artistic nature and genuine poetic mobility which made him scatter with so prodigal a hand the trifles which distressed his friends. Poetry was the melodious voice breathing from his entire manhood, not a profession, not an act of duty. It was an impulse ; the sounding chords of his poetic nature vibrated to every touch, grave and stately, sweet and impassioned, delicate and humorous. He wrote not for Fame. He wrote not for Pence. He wrote poetry because he had lived it ; and sang as the bird sings on its bough. Open to every impression, touched to ravishment by beauty, he sang whatever at the moment filled him with delight — now trilling a careless snatch of melody, now a simple ballad, now a majestic hymn ascending from the depths of his soul on incense-bearing rhythms, and now a grave quiet chaunt, slow with its rich burden of meanings. Men in whom the productive activity is great cannot be restrained from throwing off trifles, as the plant throws off buds beside the expanded flowers. Michael Angelo carved the Moses and painted the Last Judgment, but did he not also lend his master-hand to the cutting of graceful cameos ?

CHAPTER VII.

MANY-COLORED THREADS.

HITHERTO our narrative of this Weimar period has moved mainly among generalities, for only by such means could a picture of his life be painted. Now, as we advance further, it is necessary to separate the threads of his career from those of others with which it was so inwoven.

It has already been noted, that he began to tire of the follies and extravagancies of the first months. In this year, 1777, he was quiet in his Garden-house, occupied with drawing, poetry, botany, and the one constant occupation of his heart — love for the Frau von Stein. Love and ambition were the guides which led him through the labyrinth of the court. Amid those motley scenes, amid those swiftly-succeeding pleasures, Voices, sorrowing Voices of the Past, made themselves audible above the din, and recalled the vast hopes which once had given energy to his aims ; and these reverberations of an Ambition once so cherished, arrested and rebuked him, like the deep murmurs of some solemn bass moving slowly through the showering caprices of a sportive melody.

The quiet influence exercised by the Frau von Stein is visible in every page of his letters. As far as I can divine the state of things, in the absence of her letters, I fancy she coquetted with him ; when he showed any disposition to throw off her yoke, when his manner seemed to imply less warmth, she lured him back with tenderness ; and vexed him with unexpected coldness when she had drawn him once more to her feet. ‘You reproach me,’ he writes, ‘with alternations in my love. It is not true ; but it is well that I do not every day feel how utterly I love you.’ Again : ‘I cannot conceive why the main ingredients of your feeling have lately been Doubt and want of Belief. But it is certainly true that one who did not hold firm his affection might have that affection doubted away, just as a man may be persuaded that he is pale and ill.’ That she tormented him with these coquettish doubts is but too evident ; and yet when he is away from her, she writes to tell him he is become dearer ! ‘Yes, my treasure !’ he replies, ‘I believe you when you say your love increases for me during absence. When away, you love the idea you have formed of me ; but when present, that idea is often disturbed by my folly and madness. . . . I love you better when present than when absent : hence I conclude my love is truer than yours.’ At times he seems himself to have doubted whether he really loved her, or only loved the delight of her presence.

With these doubts mingles another element, his Ambition to do something which will make him worthy of her. In spite of his popularity, in spite of his genius, he has not subdued her heart, but only agitated it. He endeavors, by devotion, to succeed. Thus Love and Ambition play into each other’s hands, and keep him in a seclusion which astonishes and pains several of those who could never have enough of his company.

In the June of this year, his solitude was visited by one of the agitations he could least withstand—the death of his only sister, Cornelia. Sorrows and Dreams, is the significant entry of the following day in his Journal.

It was about this time that he undertook the care of Peter Imbaumgarten, a Swiss peasant boy, the protégé of his friend, Baron Lindau. The Baron dying, left Peter once more without protection. Goethe, whose heart was open to all, especially to children, gladly undertook to continue the Baron's care ; and as we have seen him sending home an Italian image-boy to his mother at Frankfurt, as Wilhelm Meister undertakes the care of Mignon and Felix, so does this 'cold' Goethe add love to charity, and become a father to the fatherless.

The autumn tints were beginning to mingle their red and yellow with the dark and solemn firs of the Ilmenau mountains, and Goethe and the Duke could not long keep away from the loved spot, where poetical and practical schemes occupied the day, and many a wild prank startled the night. There they danced with peasant girls till early dawn ; the net result of which was a swelled face, forcing Goethe to lay up.

On his return to Weimar, he was distressed by the receipt of one of the many letters which Werther drew upon him. He had made sentimentality poetical ; it soon became a fashion. Many were the melancholy youths who poured forth their sorrows to him, demanding sympathy and consolation. Nothing could be more antipathetic to his clear and healthy nature. It made him ashamed of his Werther. It made him merciless to all Wertherism. To relieve himself of the annoyance, he commenced the satirical extravaganza of the Triumph der Empfindsamkeit. Very significant, however, of the unalterable kindliness of his disposition is the fact, that although these sentimentalities had to him only a painful or a ludicrous aspect, he did not suffer his repugnance to the malady to destroy his sympathy for the patient. There is a proof of this in the episode he narrates of his Harz Journey, made in November and December of this year.* Most readers know his poem, Die Harzreise im Winter. The object of that journey was two-fold ; to visit the Ilmenau Mines, and to visit an unhappy misanthrope whose Wertherism had distressed him. He set out with the Duke, who had arranged a hunting party to destroy a ‘great thing of a boar,’† then ravaging the country round Eisenach ; but, although setting out with them, he left them, en route, for purposes of his own.

Through hail, frost and mud, lonely, yet companioned by great thoughts, he rode along the mountainous solitudes, and reached at last the Brocken. A bright sun shone on its eternal snows as he mounted, and looked down upon the cloud-covered Germany beneath him. Here he felt the air of freedom swell his breast. The world with its conventions lay beneath him ; the court with its distractions was afar ; and the poet stood amidst these snowy solitudes communing with that majestic spirit of Beauty which animates Nature. There,

. . . ‘high above the misty air
And turbulence of murmuring cities vast,’ ‡ he was lost in reveries of his future life :

Dem Geier gleich
Der auf den schweren Morgenwolken, Mit sanftem Fittig ruhend,
Nach Beute schaut
Schwebe mein Lied.

* And not in 1776, as he says ; that date is disproved by his letters to the Frau von Stein.

† The expression is classical, dear reader ! It is to be found in Herodotus, if not in severer writers, and seems felicitously to express the sort of wondering horror with which the peasants regarded the monster. See Clio, xxvi. Ὁ βασιλεὺς εἶος Χηῖμα μέγιστον ἀρεφάρη, x. τ. λ.

‡ Wordsworth.

This image (I adopt his own explanation) of the hawk poised above the heavy morning clouds looking for his prey, is that of the poet on those snowy heights looking down on the winter landscape, and with his mind's eye seeking amidst the perplexities of social life for some object worthy of his muse.

Writing to his beloved, he speaks of the good effect this journeying amid simple people (to whom he is only known as Herr Weber, a landscape painter) has upon his imagination. It is like a cold bath, he says. And à propos of his disguise, he remarks how very easy it is to be a rogue, and what advantages it gives one over simple honest men, to assume a character that is not your own.

But now let us turn to the second object of his journey. The letter of the misanthrope just alluded to was signed Plessing, and dated from Wernigerode. There was something remarkable in the excess of its morbidity, accompanied by indications of real talent. Goethe did not answer it, having already hampered himself in various ways by responding to such extraneous demands upon his sympathy; another and more passionate letter came, imploring an answer, which was still silently avoided. But now the idea of personally ascertaining what manner of man his correspondent was, made him swerve from his path; and under an assumed name he called on Plessing.

On hearing that his visitor came from Gotha, Plessing eagerly inquired whether he had not visited Weimar, and whether he knew the celebrated men who lived there. With perfect simplicity Goethe replied that he did, and began talking of Kraus, Bertuch, Musäus, Jägemann, etc., when he was impatiently interrupted with 'But why don't you mention Goethe?' He answered that Goethe also had he seen; upon this he was called upon to give a description of that great poet, which he did in a quiet way, sufficient to have betrayed his incognito to more sagacious eyes.

Plessing then with great agitation informed him that Goethe had not answered a most pressing and passionate letter in which he, Plessing, had described the state of his mind, and had implored direction and assistance. Goethe excused himself as he best could ; but Plessing insisted on reading him the letters, that he might judge whether they deserved such treatment.

‘Meanwhile,’ says Goethe, ‘the deplorable condition of this young man had become always clearer to me ; he had never taken cognizance of the outward world ; but had, on the contrary, cultivated his mind by multifarious reading, and directed inwards all his powers and affections ; and in this way, as in the depths of his being he found no productive talent, he had gone far to ruin himself altogether ; even the occupation and consolation which stand so gloriously open to us by employing ourselves with the ancient languages, seemed to be completely wanting to him.

‘As I had already proved, both in myself and others, that the best remedy in such cases is to throw ourselves with energy and faith upon Nature and her infinite variety, I immediately made the attempt to apply it in this case also ; and after a little reflection answered him in the following way : “I think I understand why the young man, in whom you have placed so much confidence, has remained silent to you ; for his present way of thinking is too different from yours to allow him to hope that you could come to any agreement with each other. I have myself been present during some conversations in the circle I spoke of, and have heard it maintained that a person can escape and save himself from a painful, self-torturing, gloomy state of mind, only by the contemplation of Nature, and hearty sympathy with the outward world. Even the most general acquaintance with Nature, it does not signify in what way, — any active communication with it, either in gardening or farming, hunting or mining, draws us out of ourselves ; the employment of mental energies upon real, actual appearances, gives us, by degrees, the greatest satisfaction, clearness and instruction ; just as the artist who keeps true to Nature, and at the same time goes on cultivating his mind, is certain to succeed the best.”

‘ My young friend appeared to get very restless and impatient at this, just as we do when we begin to be irritated at some foreign or entangled language, the meaning of which we cannot understand ; on which I, without much hope of a successful result, but rather for the purpose of not remaining silent, went on speaking. To me especially, as a landscape painter, I said, did this appear evident, as my particular department of Art was in direct communication with Nature : however, since that time, I had observed with more assiduity and eagerness than previously, not only noted any remarkable natural landscapes and appearances, but felt myself more full of love for all things and all men. But in order that I might not lose myself in the abstract, I related how even this compulsory winter excursion, instead of being painful to me, had furnished me with lasting enjoyment. I described to him picturesquely and poetically, and still as truly and naturally as I was able, the course of my journey ; I pictured the snow clouds which I saw that morning rolling above the mountains, with the most diversified appearances during the day-time ; and then I presented to his imagination the curious turreted and walled fortifications of Nordhausen, as seen in the twilight ; and further, in the night-time, the torrents rushing down the mountain ravines, their waters illuminated transiently, and glistening in the flickering light of the guide's lantern ; and, last of all, the miners' cavern. But here he interrupted me with warmth, and assured me that he heartily regretted the trouble he had taken in going to see it, short as the distance was ; it had not at all come up to the picture he had painted in his imagination. After what had passed, such morbid symptoms did not annoy me ; for how often had I been obliged to learn that mortals throw away the valuable possession of a clear reality for a dismal phantom of their gloomy imaginations ! Just as little did it astonish me, when he, in answer to my demand, " How he had pictured the cavern to himself ? " gave a description of it, such as the boldest scene painter would scarcely have dared to represent as the forecourt of Pluto's empire.

‘ On this I tried some more propædæutic suggestions as expedients for effecting a cure ; but these were rejected so emphatically, with the assurance that nothing in this world ever could or should content him, that my heart closed itself against him, and I felt my conscience, by the fatiguing journey I had undertaken on his account, and with the consciousness of the best intentions towards him, completely freed from the necessity of taking any further trouble about him. It was already late, when he wanted to read me the second still more passionate letter, which also was not unknown to me ; but he accepted my apology for not wishing to listen to it then, from being too tired ; giving me at the same time an invitation to dinner the day afterwards, in the name of his family ; an answer to which I told him I would give him early the next morning. And thus we parted in peace and quietness ; his person leaving quite a peculiar impression behind. He was of middle size, his features had nothing attractive, but neither had they anything repulsive in them ; his gloomy air had nothing uncourteous about it ; and he might, in fact, have passed for a well-educated young man, who had been preparing himself in retirement, in schools and academies, for the pulpit and professor's chair.

‘ On going out, I found the sky quite cleared up, and twinkling with stars, the streets and squares covered with snow ; and I stopped upon a narrow bridge, and stood quietly surveying the surrounding objects in the wintry night. At the same time I revolved the adventure in my mind, and felt myself quite resolved not to see the young man again ; in pursuance of which I ordered my horse at daybreak, delivered an anonymous and apologetic slip of paper to the waiter, to whom I was able, at the same time to say many things in praise of the young person to whom he had introduced me, and which were quite true besides, and of which, no doubt, the dexterous fellow made good use, for his own purposes. I now rode along the north-east slopes of the Harz, in wild, stormy weather, with the snow-flakes drifting around me, after having first seen the Rammelsberg, the brass-foundry, and other establishments of that kind.’ *

He was subsequently able to assist Plessing, who, on visiting him at Weimar, discovered his old acquaintance, the landscape painter. † But the characteristic part of this * Campaign in France ; translated by Robert Farie. With reference to the above narrative, some slight inaccuracy in the details (at which no one will be surprised on hearing that it was written fifteen years subsequent to the occurrence) is indicated by the Diary, fragments of which are published in the Stein correspondence : one entry is, ‘ With Plessing rambled among the mountains.’

† In 1788, Plessing was appointed Professor of Philosophy in the University of Duisburg, where Goethe visited him on his return home from the campaign in France, 1792. The reader may be interested to know, that Plessing entirely outlived his morbid melancholy, and anecdote — and that which makes me cite it here — is, the practical illustration it gives of his fundamental realism, which looked to nature and earnest activity as the sole cure for megrims sentimentalisms and self-torturings. Turn your mind to realities, and the self-made phantoms which darken your soul will disappear like night at the approach of dawn.

In the January of the following year (1778) Goethe was twice brought face to face with Death. The first was during a boar-hunt; his spear snapped in the onslaught, and he was in imminent peril, but fortunately escaped. On the following day, while he and the Duke were skating (perhaps talking over that very escape), there came a crowd over the ice, bearing the corpse of the unhappy Fräulein von Lassberg, who, in the despair of unrequited love, had drowned herself in the Ilm, close by the very spot where Goethe was wont to take his evening walk. At all times this would have been a shock to him, but the shock was greatly intensified by the fact that in the pocket of the unfortunate girl was found a copy of Werther ! * It is true we absolve an author in such cases. No reflecting man ever reproached Plato with the suicide of Cleombrotus, or Schiller with the brigandage of highwaymen. Yet when fatal coincidences occur, the author, whom we absolve, cannot so lightly absolve himself. It is in vain to argue that the work does not, rightly con-became a respectable name in German letters. His principal works are, Osiris und Socrates, 1783 ; Historische und Philosophische Untersuchungen über die Denkart Theologie und Philosophie der ältesten Völker, 1785 ; and Memnonium, oder Versuche zur Enthüllung der Geheimnisse des Alterthums, 1787. He died 1806.

* Riemer, who will never admit anything that may seem to tell against his idol, endeavors to throw a doubt on this fact, saying it was reported only out of malice. But he gives no reasons.

sidered, lead to suicide ; if it does so, wrongly considered, it is the proximate cause, and the author cannot easily shake off that weight of blame. Goethe, standing upon logic, might have said : ‘ If Plato instigated the suicide of Cleombrotus, certainly he averted that of Olympiodorus ; if I have been one of the causes which moved this girl towards that fatal act, I have also certainly been the cause of saving others, notably that young Frenchman who wrote to thank me.’ He might have argued thus ; but Conscience is tenderer than Logic ; and if, in firing at a wild beast, I kill a brother hunter, my conscience will not leave me altogether in peace.

The body was borne to the house of the Frau von Stein, which stood nearest the spot, and there he remained with it the whole day, exerting himself to console the wretched parents. He himself had need of some consolation. It affected him deeply, and led him to speculate on all cognate subjects, especially on melancholy. ‘ This inviting sadness,’ he beautifully says, ‘ has a dangerous fascination, like water itself, and we are charmed by the reflex of the stars of heaven which shines through both.’

He was soon, however, ‘ forced into theatrical levity’ by the various rehearsals necessary for the piece to be performed on the birthday of the Duchess. This was the Triumph der Empfindsamkeit. The adventure with Plessing, and finally this tragedy of the Fräulein von Lassberg had given increased force to his antagonism against Wertherism and Sentimentality, which he now lashed with unsparing ridicule. The hero of this extravaganza is a Prince, whose soul is only fit for moonlight ecstasies and sentimental rhapsodies. He adores Nature ; not the rude, rough, imperfect Nature whose gigantic energy would alarm any truly sensitive mind ; but the beautiful rose-pink Nature of books. (He likes Nature as one sees it at the Opera.) Rocks are picturesque, it is true ; but they are often crowned with tiaras of snow, sparkling but apt to make one 'chilly ;' turbulent winds howl through their clefts and crannies in a style alarming to delicate nerves. The Prince is not fond of the winds. Sunrise and early morn are lovely — but damp ; and the Prince is liable to rheumatism.

To obviate all such inconveniences he has had a mechanical imitation of Nature executed for his use, and this accompanies him on his travels ; so that at a moment's notice, in secure defiance of rheumatism, he can enjoy a moonlight scene, a sunny landscape, or a sombre grove.

He is in love ; but his mistress is as factitious as his landscapes. Woman is charming but capricious, fond but exacting ; and therefore the Prince has a doll dressed in the same style as the woman he once loved. By the side of this doll he passes hours of rapture ; for it he sighs ; for it he rhapsodizes.

The real woman appears — the original of that much treasured image. Is he enraptured ? Not in the least. His heart does not palpitate in her presence ; he does not recognize her ; but throws himself once more into the arms of his doll, and thus sensibility triumphs.

There are five acts of this 'exquisite fooling.' Originally it was much coarser and more personal than we now see it. Böttiger says that there scarcely remains a shadow of its flashing humor and satiric caprice. The whip of Aristophanes was applied with powerful wrist to every fashionable folly, in dress, literature, or morals, and the spectators saw themselves as in a mirror of sarcasm. At the conclusion, the doll was ripped open, and out fell a multitude of books, such as were then the rage, upon which severe and ludicrous judgments were passed — and the severest upon Werther. The whole piece was inter-persed with ballets, music and comical changes of scene ; so that what now appears a tiresome farce, was then an irresistible extravaganza.

This extravaganza has the foolery of Aristophanes, and the ‘physical fun’ of that riotous wit, whom Goethe was then studying. But when German critics are in ecstasies with its wit and irony, I confess myself at a loss to conceive clearly what they mean. National wit, however, is perhaps scarcely amenable to criticism. What the German thinks exquisitely ludicrous, is to a Frenchman, or an Englishman, generally of a quite mediocre mirthfulness. Wit, which requires delicate handling, the Germans generally touch with gloved hands. Sarcasm is with them a sabre not a rapier, hacking the victim where a thrust would suffice. It is a noticeable fact that amid all the riches of their Literature they have nothing strictly speaking Comic of a high order. They have produced no Comedy. To them may be applied the couplet wherein the great original of Grotesque Seriousness sets forth his verdict :

*Κωμωδοδιδασκαλίαν είναι χαλεπωτάτον εργον άπαντων, Πολλών γαρ δη πειρασάντων αυτήν ολίγοις χαρισσάσθαι.**

which I will venture to turn thus :

Miss Comedy is a sad flirt, — you may guess,
From the number who court her, the few she doth bless !

* Aristophanes, Equites, v. 516.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE REAL PHILANTHROPIST.

A STRANGE phantasmagoria is the life he led at this epoch. His employments are manifold, yet his studies, his drawing, etching and rehearsing are carried on as if they alone were the occupation of the day. His immense activity, and power of varied employment, scatter the energies which might be consecrated to some great work; but in return, they give him the varied store of material of which he stood so much in need. At this time he is writing Wilhelm Meister and Egmont; Iphigenia is also taking shape in his mind. His office gives him much to do; and Gervinus, who must have known how great were the calls upon his time, should have paused ere he threw out the insinuation of 'diplomatic rudeness' when Goethe answered one of his brother-in-law's letters through his secretary. Surely with a brother-in-law one may take such latitude? *

This man, whose diplomatic coldness and artistocratic haughtiness have formed the theme of so many long tirades, was of all Germans the most sincerely democratic, until the Reign of Terror in France frightened him, as it * Since the above was written, the correspondence with the Frau v. Stein has appeared; and from it we learn that in Switzerland he even dictated some letters to her!

did others, into more modified opinions. Not only was he always delighted to be with the people, and to share their homely ways, which his own simple tastes made consonant with theirs, but we find him in the confidence of intimacy expressing his sympathy with the people in the heartiest terms. When among the miners he writes to his beloved, 'How strong my love has returned upon me for these lower classes! which one calls the lower, but which in God's eyes are assuredly the highest! Here you meet all the virtues combined: Contentedness, Moderation, Truth, Straightforwardness, Joy in the slightest good, Harmlessness, Patience — Patience — Constancy in — in . . . . I will not lose myself in panegyric!' Again, he is writing Iphigenia, but the news of the misery and famine among the stocking-weavers of Apolda paralyzes him. 'The Drama will not advance a step: it is cursed; the King of Tauris must speak as if no stocking-weaver in Apolda felt the pangs of hunger!'

In striking contrast stands the expression of his contempt for what was called the 'great world,' as he watched it in his visits to the neighboring Courts. If affection bound him to Karl August, whom he was forming, and to Luise, for whom he had a tender chivalrous regard, his eyes were not blind to the nullity of other princes and their followers. 'Good society have I seen,' runs one of his epigrams; 'they call it the "good," although there is not in it the material for the smallest of poems.'

Gute Gesellschaft hab' ich gesehen; man nennt sie die Gute Wenn sie zum kleinsten Gedicht keine Gelegenheit giebt.

Notably was this the case in his journey with the Duke to Berlin, May 1778. He only remained a few days there; saw much, and not without contempt. 'I have got quite close to old Fritz, having seen his way of life, his gold, his silver, his statues, his apes, his parrots, and heard his own curs twaddle about the great man.' He shut his soul from the Berlin world 'as if in a castle.' With the men he held no intercourse. 'I have spoken no word in the Prussian dominions which might not be made public. Therefore I am called haughty and so forth.' Varnhagen intimates that the ill-will he excited by not visiting the literati, and by his reserve, was so great as to make him averse from hearing of his visit in after years.* What, indeed, as Varnhagen asks, had Goethe in common with Nicolai, Ramler, Engel, Zellner, and the rest? Humboldt he visited at Tegel, but the great traveller was then a youth, and had not taken his place among the notables. Frederick the Great took no notice of him. Indeed, Frederick's admiration lay in other directions. What culture he had was French, and his opinion of German literature had been very explicitly pronounced in a work published this year, in which Götz von Berlichingen was cited as a sample of the reigning bad taste. The passage is too curious to be omitted. 'Vous y verrez représenter les abominables pièces de Shakspear traduites en notre langue, et tout l'auditoire se pâmer d'aise en entendant ces farces ridicules, et dignes des sauvages de Canada.' That certainly was afflicting to 'le bon goût;' but that was not the worst. Shakespeare might be pardoned for his faults, 'car la naissance des arts n'est jamais le point de leur maturité. Mais voilà encore un Goetz de Berlichingen qui paraît sur la scène, imitation détestable de ces mauvaises pièces anglaises, et le parterre applaudit et demande avec enthousiasme la répétition de ces dégoûtantes platitudes!' †

* Vermischte Schriften, iii. p. 62.

† De la Littérature Allemande, p. 46. His opinion of the newly-discovered Nibelungen Lied was no less characteristically contemptuous: he declared he would not give such rubbish house-room.

Thus the two German Emperors, Fritz and Wolfgang, held no spiritual congress; perhaps no good result could have been elicited by their meeting. Yet they were, each in his own sphere, the two most potent men then reigning. Fritz did not directly assist the literature of his country, but his indirect influence has been indicated by Griepenkerl.* He awoke the Germans from their sleep by the rolling of drums; those who least liked the clang of arms or the 'divisions of a battle field,' were nevertheless awakened to the fact that something important was going on in life, and they rubbed their sleepy eyes, and tried to see a little into that. The roll of drums has this merit, at all events, that it draws men from their library table to the window, and so makes them look out upon the moving, living world of action, wherein the erudite may see a 'considerable sensation' made even by men unable to conjugate a Greek verb in 'μυ.' †

On returning to Weimar, Goethe occupied himself with various architectural studies, à propos of the rebuilding of the palace; and commenced those alterations in the park, which resulted in the beautiful distribution formerly described. But I pass over many details of his activity, to narrate an episode which must win the heart of every reader. In these pages it has been evident, I hope, that no compromise with the truth has led me to gloss over faults, or to conceal shortcomings. All that testimony warrants I have reproduced: good and evil, as in the mingled yarn of life. Faults and deficiencies, even griev-* Der Kunstgenius der Deutschen Literatur des letzten Jahrhunderts, i. p. 52.

† Dr. George has become famous (or did become so — for, alas! what is fame?) by his shrewd suspicion that Frederick with all his victories could not accomplish that feat of intellectual vigor. Many men still measure greatness by verbs in μυ.

ous errors, do not estrange a friend from our hearts; why should they lower a hero? Why should the biographer fear to trust the tolerance of human sympathy? Why labor to prove a hero faultless? The reader is no valet de chambre, incapable of crediting greatness in a robe de chambre. Never should we forget the profound saying of Hegel, in answer to the vulgar aphorism ('No man is a hero to his valet de chambre'); namely, 'This is not because the Hero is no Hero, but because the Valet is a Valet.*' Having trusted to the effect which the true man would produce, in spite of all drawbacks,—and certain that the true man was loveable as well as admirable, I have made no direct appeal to the reader's sympathy, nor tried to 'make out a case in favor of extraordinary virtue.'

But the tribute of affectionate applause is claimed now we have arrived at a passage in his life so characteristic of the delicacy, generosity and nobility of his nature, that it is scarcely possible for any one not to love him, after reading it. Of generosity, in the more ordinary sense, there are abundant examples in his history. Riemer has instanced several, † but these are acts of kindness, thoughtfulness and courtesy, such as one expects to find in a prosperous poet. That he was kind, gave freely, sympathized freely, acted disinterestedly, and that his kindness showed itself in trifles quite as much as in important actions (a most significant trait !‡), is known to all persons moderately * Nicht aber darum weil dieser kein Held ist, sondern weil jener der Kammerdiener ist.' — Philosophie der Geschichte, p. 40. Goethe repeated this as an epigram; and Carlyle has wrought it into the minds of hundreds; but Hegel is the originator.

† Mittheilungen, vol. i. 102–5.

‡ There is lamentable confusion in our estimation of character on this point of generosity. We often mistake a spasm of sensibility acquainted with German literature. But the disposition exhibited in the story I am about to tell is such as few would have imagined to be lying beneath the stately prudence and calm self-mastery of the man so often styled 'heartless.'

This is the story : A man (his name still remains a secret) of a strange, morbid, suspicious disposition, had fallen into destitution, partly from unfortunate circumstances, partly from his own fault. He applied to Goethe for assistance, as so many others did ; and he painted his condition in all the eloquence of despair.

'According to the idea I form of you from your letters,' writes Goethe, 'I fancy I am not deceived, and this to me is very painful, in believing that I cannot give help or hope to one who needs so much. But I am not the man to say, "Arise, and go farther." Accept the little that I can give, as a plank thrown towards you for momentary succor. If you remain longer where you are, I will gladly see that in future you receive some slight assistance. In acknowledging the receipt of this money, pray inform me how far you can make it go. If you are in want of a dress, greatcoat, boots, or warm stockings, tell me so ; I have some that I can spare.

'Accept this drop of balsam from the compendious medicine-chest of the Samaritan, in the same spirit as it is offered.'

This was on the 2d of November, 1778. On the 11th for the strength of lovingness — making an occasional act of kindness the sign of a kind nature. Benjamin Constant says of himself : 'Je puis faire de bonnes et fortes actions ; je ne puis avoir de bons procédés. There are hundreds like him. On the other hand, there are hundreds who willingly perform many little acts of kindness and courtesy, but who never rise to the dignity of generosity ; these are poor natures, ignorant of the grander throbbings of human pulses.

he writes again, and from the letter we see that he had resolved to do more than throw out a momentary plank to the shipwrecked man — in fact he had undertaken to support him.

‘In this parcel you will receive a greatcoat, boots, stockings and some money. My plan for you this winter is this :

‘In Jena living is cheap. I will arrange for board, lodging, etc., on the strictest economy, and will say it is for some one who, with a small pension, desires to live in retirement. When that is secured I will write to you ; you can then go there, establish yourself in your quarters, and I will send you cloth and lining, with the necessary money, for a coat, which you can get made, and I will inform the rector that you were recommended to me, and that you wish to live in retirement at the University.

‘You must then invent some plausible story, have your name entered on the books of the University, and no soul will ever inquire more about you, neither Burgomaster nor Amtmann. I have not sent you one of my coats, because it might be recognized in Jena. Write to me and let me know what you think of this plan, and at all events in what character you propose to present yourself.’

The passage in italics indicates great thoughtfulness. Indeed the whole of this correspondence shows the most tender consideration for the feelings of his protégé. In the postscript he says : ‘And now step boldly forth again upon the path of life ! We live but once . . . . Yes, I know perfectly what it is to take the fate of another upon one’s own shoulders, but you shall not perish !’ On the 23d he writes :

‘I received to-day your two letters of the 17th and 18th, and have so far anticipated their contents as to have caused inquiry to be made in Jena for the fullest details as for one who wished to live there under the quiet protection of the University. Till the answer arrives keep you quiet at Gera, and the day after to-morrow I will send you a parcel and say more.

‘Believe me you are not a burden on me; on the contrary, it teaches me economy. I fritter away much of my income which I might spare for those in want. And do you think that your tears and blessings go for nothing? He who has, must give, not bless; and if the Great and the Rich have divided between them the goods of this world, Fate has counterbalanced these by giving to the wretched the powers of blessing, powers to which the fortunate know not how to aspire.’

Noble words! In the mouth of a pharisaical philanthropist declaiming instead of giving, there would be something revolting in such language; but when we know that the hand which wrote these words was ‘open as day to melting charity,’ when we know that (in spite of all other claims) he gave up for some years the sixth part of his very moderate income to rescue this stranger from want, when we know by the irrefragable arguments of deeds, that this language was no hollow phrase, but the deep and solemn utterance of a thoroughly human heart, then, I say, those words awaken reverberations within our hearts, calling up feelings of loving reverence for him who uttered them.

How wise and kind is this also: ‘Perhaps there will soon turn up occasions for you to be useful to me where you are, for it is not the Project-maker and Promiser, but he who in trifles affords real service, that is welcome to one who would so willingly do something good and enduring.

‘Hate not the poor philanthropists with their precautions and conditions, for one need. pray diligently to retain, amidst such bitter experience, the good-will, courage and levity of youth, which are the main ingredients of benevolence. And it is more than a benefit which God bestows when He calls us, who can so seldom do anything, to lighten the burden of one truly wretched.'

The next letter, dated December 11th, explains itself:

'Your letter of the 7th I received early this morning. And first to calm your mind: you shall be forced to nothing; the hundred dollars you shall have, live where you may; but now listen to me.

'I know that to a man his Ideas are Realities; and although the image you have of Jena is false, still I know that nothing is less easily reasoned away than such hypochondriacal anxieties. I think Jena the best place for your residence, and for many reasons. The University has long lost its ancient wildness and aristocratic prejudices; the students are not worse than in other places, and among them there are some charming people. In Jena, they are so accustomed to the flux and reflux of men that no individual is remarked. And there are too many living in excessively straitened means, for poverty to be either a stigma or a noticeable peculiarity. Moreover it is a city where you can more easily procure all necessities. In the country during winter, ill, and without medical advice, would not that be miserable?

'Further, the people to whom I referred you are good domestic people, who, on my account, would treat you well. Whatever might occur to you, I should be in a condition, one way or another, to assist you. I could aid you in establishing yourself; need only for the present guarantee your board and lodging, and pay for it later on. I could give you a little on New Year's Day, and procure what was necessary on credit. You would be nearer to me. Every market day I could send you something — wine, victuals, utensils that would cost me little, and would make your existence more tolerable ; and I could thus make you more a part of my household expenses. The objection to Gera is, that communication with it is so difficult ; things do not arrive at proper times, and cost money which benefits no one. You would probably remain six months in Jena before any one remarked your presence. This is the reason why I preferred Jena to every other place, and you would do the same if you could but see things with untroubled vision. How, if you were to make a trial ? However, I know a fly can distract a man with sensitive nerves, and that, in such cases, reasoning is powerless.

‘ Consider it : it will make all things easier. I promise you you will be comfortable in Jena. But if you cannot overcome your objections, then remain in Gera. At New Year you shall have twenty-five dollars, and the same regularly every quarter. I cannot arrange it otherwise. I must look to my own household demands ; that which I have given you already, because I was quite unprepared for it, has made a hole, which I must stop up as I can.

‘ If you were in Jena, I could give you some little commissions to execute for me, and perhaps some occupation ; I could also make your personal acquaintance, and so on.

‘ But act just as your feelings dictate ; if my reasons do not convince you, remain in your present solitude. Commence the writing of your life, as you talk of doing, and send it me piece-meal, and be persuaded that I am only anxious for your quiet and comfort, and chose Jena simply because I could there do more for you.’

The hypochondriacal fancies of the poor man were invincible ; and instead of going to Jena he went to Ilmenau, where Goethe secured him a home, and sent him books and money. Having thus seen to his material comforts, he besought him to occupy his mind by writing out the experience of his life, and what he had observed on his travels. In the following letter he refers to his other protégé, Peter Imbaumgarten.

‘I am very glad the contract is settled. Your maintenance thus demands a hundred dollars yearly, and I will guarantee the twenty-five dollars quarterly, and contrive also that by the end of this month you shall receive a regular allowance for pocket-money. I will also send what I can in natura, such as paper, pens, sealing wax, etc. Meanwhile here are some books.

‘Thanks for your news; continue them. The wish to do good is a bold, proud wish; we must be thankful when we can secure even a little bit.

‘I have now a proposition to make. When you are in your new quarters I wish you would pay some attention to a boy, whose education I have undertaken, and who learns the huntsman’s craft in Ilmenau. He has begun French; could you not assist him in it? He draws nicely; could you not keep him to it? I would fix the hours when he should come to you. You would lighten my anxiety about him if you could by friendly intercourse ascertain the condition of his mind, and inform me of it; and if you could keep an eye upon his progress. But of course this depends on your feeling disposed to undertake such a task. Judging from myself — intercourse with children always makes me feel young and happy. On hearing your answer, I will write more particulars. You will do me a real service, and I shall be able to add monthly the trifle which I have set aside for the boy’s education.

‘I trust I shall still be able to lighten your sad condition, so that you may recover your cheerfulness.’

Let me call attention to the delicacy with which he here intimates that he does not mean to occupy Kraft’s* time without remunerating it. If that passage be thoroughly considered, it will speak as much for the exquisite kindness of Goethe's nature as any greater act of liberality. Few persons would have considered themselves unentitled to ask such a service from one whose existence they had secured. To pay for it would scarcely have entered their thoughts. But Goethe felt that to demand a service, which might be irksome, would, in a certain way, be selling benevolence; if he employed Kraft's time, it was right that he should pay what he would have paid another master. On the other hand, he instinctively shrunk from the indelicacy of making a decided bargain. It was necessary to intimate that the lessons would be paid for; but with that intimation he also conveyed the idea that in undertaking such a task, Kraft would be conferring an obligation upon him; so that Kraft might show his gratitude, might benefit his benefactor, and nevertheless be benefited. After reading such a sentence I could, to use Wieland's expression, 'have eaten Goethe for love!'

* Herr Kraft was the assumed name of this still anonymous protégé.

Kraft accepted the charge; and Goethe having sent him some linen for shirts, some cloth for a coat, and begged him to write without the least misgiving, now sends this letter:

'Many thanks for your care of Peter; the boy greatly interests me, for he is a legacy of the unfortunate Lindau. Do him all the good you can quietly. How you may advance him! I care not whether he reads, draws, or learns French, so that he does occupy his time, and I hear your opinion of him. For the present, let him consider his first object is to acquire the huntsman's craft, and try to learn from him how he likes it, and how he gets on with it. For, believe me, man must have a trade which will support him. The artist is never paid; it is the artisan. Chodowiecki, the artist whom we admire, would eat but scanty mouthfuls; but Chodowiecki, the artisan, who with his wood-cuts illumines the most miserable daubs, he is paid.'

In a subsequent letter he says, 'Many thanks. By your attention to these things, and your care of Peter, you have performed true service for me, and richly repaid all that I may have been able to do for you. Be under no anxiety about the future, there will certainly occur opportunities wherein you can be useful to me; meanwhile continue as heretofore.' This was written on the very day of his return to Weimar from the Swiss journey! If this tells us of his attention to his protégé, the next letter tells us of his anticipating even the casualty of death, for he had put Kraft on the list of those whom he left as legacies of benevolence to his friends. It should be remarked that Goethe seems to have preserved profound secrecy with respect to the good he was then doing; not even in his confidential letters to Frau von Stein is there one hint of Kraft's existence. In short, nothing is wanting to complete the circle of genuine benevolence.

The year 1781 began with an increase of Kraft's pension; or rather, instead of paying a hundred dollars for his board and lodging, and allowing him pocket-money, he made the sum two hundred dollars. 'I can spare as much as that; and you need not be anxious about every trifle, but can lay out your money as you please. Adieu; and let me soon hear that all your sorrows have left you.' This advance seems to have elicited a demand for more money, which produced the following characteristic answer.

'You have done well to disclose the whole condition of your mind to me; I can make all allowances, little as I may be able to completely calm you. My own affairs will not permit me to promise you a farthing more than the two hundred dollars, unless I were to get into debt, which in my place would be very unseemly. This sum you shall receive regularly. Try to make it do.

‘I certainly do not suppose that you will change your place of residence without my knowledge and consent. Every man has his duty, make a duty of your love to me and you will find it light.

‘It would be very disagreeable to me if you were to borrow from any one. It is precisely this miserable unrest now troubling you which has been the misfortune of your whole life, and you have never been more contented with a thousand dollars than you now are with two hundred; because you always still desired something which you had not, and have never accustomed your soul to accept the limits of necessity. I do not reproach you with it; I know, unhappily too well, how it pertains to you, and feel how painful must be the contrast between your present and your past. But enough! One word for a thousand: at the end of every quarter you shall receive fifty dollars; for the present an advance shall be made. Limit your wants: the Must is hard, and yet solely by this Must can we show how it is with us in our inner man. To live according to caprice requires no peculiar powers.’ *

The following explains itself:

‘If you once more read over my last letter, you will see plainly that you have misinterpreted it. You are neither fallen in my esteem, nor have I a bad opinion of you, neither have I suffered my good opinion to be led astray, nor has your mode of thinking become damaged in my eyes : all these are exaggerated expressions, such as a rational man should not permit himself. Because I also speak out my thoughts with freedom, because I wish certain traits in your conduct and views somewhat different, does that mean that I look on you as a bad man, and that I wish to discontinue our relations ?

* I will give the original of this fine saying, as I have rendered it but clumsily: Das Muss ist hart, aber beim Muss kann der Mensch allein zeigen wie's inwendig mit ihm steht. Willkürlich leben kann jeder.

‘ It is these hypochondriacal, weak and exaggerated notions, such as your last letter contains, which I blame and regret. Is it proper that you should say to me : I am to prescribe the tone in which all your future letters must be written. Does one command an honorable, rational man such things as that ? Is it ingenuous in you on such an occasion to underline the words that you eat my bread ? Is it becoming in a moral being, when one gently blames him, or names something in him as a malady, to fly out as if one had pulled the house about his ears ?

‘ Do not misconstrue me, therefore, if I wish to see you contented and satisfied with the little I can do for you.

‘ So, if you will, things shall remain just as they were ; at all events I shall not change my behavior towards you.’

The unhappy man seems to have been brought to a sense of his injustice by this, for although there is but one more letter, bearing the date 1783, that is, two years, subsequent to the one just given, the connection lasted for six years. The dénouement is untold ; and we know not whether death released Goethe from the responsibility, or whether Kraft’s circumstances were bettered by any regular employment. When Goethe undertook to write the life of Duke Bernhard he employed Kraft to make extracts for him from the Archives ; which extracts, Luden, when he came to look over them with a biographical purpose, found utterly worthless.* The last words we find of * See Luden’s Rückblicke in Mein Leben.

Goethe's addressed to Kraft are, ' You have already been of service to me, and other opportunities will offer. I have no grace to dispense, and my favor is not so fickle. Farewell, and enjoy your little in peace.'

I do not envy the philosophy of that man who can read these letters unmoved. To my apprehension they reveal a nature so exquisite in far-thoughted tenderness, so true and human in its sympathies with suffering, and so ready to alleviate suffering by sacrifices rarely made to friends, much less to strangers, that after reading them, the epithets of ' cold ' and ' heartless,' so often applied to him, sound like blasphemies against the noblest feelings of humanity. Observe, this Kraft was no romantic object appealing to the sensibility ; he had no thrilling story to stimulate sympathy ; there was no ' subscription list ' opened for him ; there were no coteries weeping over his misfortunes. Unknown, unfriended, ill at ease with himself and with the world, he revealed his wretchedness in secret to the great poet, and in secret that poet pressed his hand, dried his eyes and ministered to his wants. And he did this not as one act, not as one passing impulse, but as the sustained sympathy of six years.

Pitiful and pathetic to me is the thought that such a man can, for so many years, both in his own country and in ours, have been reproached, nay even vituperated as cold and heartless ! A certain reserve and stiffness of manner, a certain soberness of old age, a want of political enthusiasm, and some sentences wrenched from their true meaning, are the evidences, whereon men build the strange hypothesis that he was an Olympian Jove sitting above Humanity, seeing life but not feeling it, his heart dead to all noble impulses, his career, a calculated egotism. How it was that one so heartless became the greatest poet of modern times — how it was that he whose works contained the widest compass of human life, should himself be a bloodless, pulseless Diplomatist — no one thought of explaining till Menzel arose, and with unparalleled effrontery maintained that Goethe had no genius, but only talent, and that the miracle of his works lies in their style — a certain adroitness in representation ! Menzel is a man so completely rejected by England — the translation of his work met with such hopeless want of encouragement, — that I am perhaps wrong to waste a line upon it ; but the bold style in which his trenchant accusations are made, and the assumption of a certain manliness as the momentum to his sarcasms, have given his attacks on Goethe a circulation independent of his book. To me he appears radically incompetent to appreciate a poet. I should as soon think of asking the first stalwart Kentish farmer for his opinion on the Parthenon. The farmer would doubtless utter some energetic sentences expressive of his sense of its triviality ; but the brutality of his language would not supply the place of knowledge, feeling and taste ; nor does the brutality of Menzel's style supply those deficiencies of nature and education which incapacitate him for the perception of Art.

The paradox still remains then, in spite of Menzel : A great poet destitute of the feelings which poetry incarnates — a man with a great soul, destitute of soul — a man who wrote Werther, Egmont, Faust, Hermann und Dorothea, and Meister, yet knew not the joys and sorrows of his kind ; will any one defend that paradox ? * Not only

* I remember once, as we were walking along Piccadilly, talking about the infamous Buchlein von Goethe, Carlyle stopping suddenly and with his peculiar look and emphasis, saying, ‘ Yes it is the wild cry of amazement on the part of all spoonneys that the Titan was not that paradox, but the still more inexplicable one, of all who knew Goethe, whether they were his peers or his servants, loving him as only loveable natures can be loved. Children, women, clerks, professors, poets, princes — all loved him. Even Herder, bitter against every one, spoke of him with a reverence which astonished Schiller, who writes: ‘He is by many besides Herder named with a species of devotion, and still more loved as a man than admired as an author. Herder says he has a clear, universal mind, the truest and deepest feeling, and the greatest purity of heart.’* Men might learn so much from his works had not the notion of his coldness and indifference disturbed their judgment. ‘In no line,’ says Carlyle, ‘does he speak with asperity of any man, scarcely of anything. He knows the good and loves it; he knows the bad and hateful and rejects it; but in neither case with violence. His love is calm and active; his rejection implied rather than pronounced.’

But so it is in life: a rumor, originating perhaps in thoughtless ignorance, circulated by relentless malice, gains credence in the face of evidence, which no amount of evidence suffices to dissipate. There is an atmosphere round certain names, a halo of glory or a halo of infamy, and men perceive this halo without seeking to ascertain its origin. Every public man is in some respects mythical; and the fables are believed in spite of all the contradictions of evidence. It is useless to hope that men will pause to inquire into the truth of what they hear said of another, before accepting and repeating it; but with respect to a spooney too! Here is a godlike intellect, and yet you see he is not an idiot! Not in the least a spooney!’

* Briefw. mit Körner, i. p. 136.

Goethe, who has now been nearly a quarter of a century in his grave, one may hope that evidence so strong as these pages furnish may be held more worthy of credence than anything which gossip or ignorance, misconception or partisanship, has flung upon the wings of Rumor.

A P P E N D I X .

---

APPENDIX A.

Latin Dialogue composed by Goethe in his eighth year.

PATER ET FILIUS. JAN. 1757.

F. Licetne tecum ire in cellam vinariam?

P. Immo licebit : ut primum dixeris, quid illic facturus sis.

F. Audio, quod vina replenda sint, cujus rei notionem veram habere cuperem.

P. Astute, latet sub hoc quid monstri : dic verum.

F. Ingenue fatear : volupe est tandem aliquando videre lapidem fundamentalem et clausularem.

P. Sequere me, voluntati tuæ in utroque satis fiet.

F. Lubens sequar. Verum ecce sumus ad scalas. Quæ tenebræ Cimmeriæ, sepulcrum ipsum non potest esse obscurius.

P. Mitte hanc, hac vice, funestam imaginem : descende mi fili provide et mox infra lucem invenies.

F. Rectissime : jamjam omnes res circumjacentes video, ut, athena, ollas, doliola, orcas, labra e. i. g. a.

P. Exspecta paulisper, plura adhuc eaque clariora hactenus tibi patefient.

F. Profecto, clarum illud perpausillum quod per cellæ spiraculum intrat illuminat omnia.

P. Ubinam igitur opinaris, genio tuo satisfacere.

F. Lapidem quidem, quem dicunt, clausularem super caput meum optime cerno, at lapidem fundamentalem reperire non licet.

P. Ecce in isto angulo in murum inclusus eminet.

F. Video et recorder, illum multis solenitatibus adhibitis a me eo collocatum fuisse.

P. Potesne alia atque alia eodem tempore gesta, tibi revocare in memoriam.

F. Quidni: Me ipsum video scilicet in abisso ut murarium amictum spatulam manu tenentem magnoque murariorum sociorum agmine stipatum, lapicida latus meum claudente.

P. Nihilne amplius tunc eveniebat?

F. Quod sic. Primarius nempe eorum murariorum Cicero-nem (ut solent) agere voluit, cui tamen concione vix cœpta vox faucibus hæsit, steteruntque comæ * quas præ pudore sibi evellere non cessavit spectatoribus interim cum deridentibus.

P. Quid boni nunc ad hunc lapidem cogitas, quem intueri adeo anhelasti?

F. Cogito mecum et opto, ut iste haud prius quam cum mundi ipsius interitu universali de loco suo moveatur.

P. Id soli Deo commitendum esse certe scio. Tu vero pro-gredere mecum ulterius.

F. Papæ, quam commode nobis ex hac in majorem transire licet cellam multa sane opera multoque oleo constiterit usque dum hæc apertura conficeretur.

P. Rem acu tetigisti: adde adhuc periculum, quod operarii iniverunt, inprimis in exstruendis, quas hic vides, scalis prima-riis, ubi tota fere hæc fornix fulcris innumeris sustinebatur.

F. Et tamen in tantis periculis habitationem ipsi non muta-vimus. O salutarem inscitiam! etenim si ego hoc scivissem, non tam secure in utramvis aurem dormivissem:

P. An nescis, quam dulce sit, præteritorum meminisse peri-culorum.

At, mi fili, respice nunc et alterum scopum, quomodo videli-cet implentur dolia.

F. Hem, quid hoc sibi vult, quod tantum vini singulis doliis infundatur : quorsum igitur abit, cum in hac re teneamus modum.

* This is a verse from Virgil transposed.

P. Optime animadvertis, scito igitur, vina in dies etiam non utendo sese consumere, quæ, nisi dicta ratione restituerentur, omnia tandem evanescerent.

F. Atqui, hoc pacto consultius esset, istam absumptionem utendo atque fruendo prævenire quam ab illa præveniri, nam quid prodest cella vinis plena, si in auram abirent.

P. Stulte ! huic decremento minori, ut vides, sumtu, obviam eundum est.

F. Do manum : sed quæ vina his in doliis asservantur.

P. Docta (!) quidem est hæc ignorantia, hoc tamen habeto, quod multos annos computent proptereaue rarissima sint, idque tibi dico, ut aliquando illis moderate utaris et in seram posteritatem illa transferri quoque studeas.

F. Curabo : sed pace tua scire velim, utrum id vini genus forsitan sit, quod Theologicum vocari tribusque istis literis C O S indicari solent (!).

P. Eia quam facete respondes. Boni isti Theologi multum in hac re pati debent, cum tamen plerique eorum ab illis bibendis abstinere cogantur.

F. Hoc quoque verum est, quare iidem illud dicterium in Jureconsultos referre amant.

P. Hæc sufficiant.

APPENDIX B.

THESE Felicitationes novæ indicate something more than his progress in Latin and Greek : they give glimpses of the turn of thought which directed his studies. The spelling and accentuation are the boy's.

- I. Opto ut sit hic dies benedictiones ac pacis.

Εὐχόμεαι ἵνα αὐτὴ ἡ ἡμέρα τῆς εὐεργεσίας καὶ τῆς εἰρήνης ᾖ.

(I hope that this day will be a day of blessing and of peace.)

- II. Opto ut transigas hunc diem sanitate optima in pace et salute.

Δέχομαι, ἵνα διάγῃ αὐτὴν ἡμέραν ἐν ὑγείᾳ καὶ ἀσφάλειᾳ καὶ εὐερίᾳ.

(I pray that you may pass this day in peace, security and good health.)

- III. Precor ut hunc diem transmittas in spe et potentia Spiritus sancti.

Εὐχόμεαι ἵνα διάγῃ αὐτὴν ἡμέραν ἐν ἐλπίδι καὶ δυνάμει τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος.

(I pray that you may this day live in the hope and grace of the Holy Ghost.)

- IV. Hodie omnia juxta fatum fient.

Σήμερον πάντα ἐπὶ θεὸν γίγνεται.

(To-day let all things be ruled by God.)

- V. Deus omnipotens animam cum corpore servet ut possis curis semper adesse tuis.

Θεὸς ὁ παντοκράτωρ τὴν ψυχὴν μετὰ σώματι σώσῃ ἵνα δυνήσῃ ταῖς μερίμναις σὺν παθεῖναι.

(Almighty God preserve thy soul with thy body, that thou mayest always be equal to thy trials.)

APPENDIX C.

POSITIONES JURIS

Quas auspice Deo inclyti jureconsultorum ordinis consensu pro licentia

Summos in utroque jure honores rite consequendi, in Alma Argentinensi die VI. Augusti M.DCC.LXXI.

h. l. q. c.

Publice defendet

JOANNES WOLFGANG GOETHE.

Mœno-Francofurtensis.

1. Jus naturæ est, quod natura omnia animalia docuit.
2. Consuetudo abrogat et emendat legem scriptam.
3. Idonea cautio fit tam per pignora, quam per fidijussores.
4. Pactum contractibus bonæ fidei adjectum parit actionem ;
sed stricti juris contractibus appositum actionem non producit.
5. Prodigus non ipso jure, sed Magistratus sententia honorum administratione interdicitur, et post interdictionem promittendo, ne quidem naturaliter obligatur.
6. Illiterati et juris imperiti judices non esse possunt.
7. Transactio super re certa vel judicata fieri non potest.
8. Servitute imposita, ne luminibus officiatur, tam de futuris, quam de præsentibus luminibus cautum censetur.
9. Testatur non potest usufructuario remittere cautionem fructuariam earum rerum, quæ usu consumuntur, in præjudicium hæredis.
10. Publiciana actio cum rei vindicatione in eodem libello conjugi potest.

11. In stricti juris actionibus fructus non veniunt nisi a tempore litis contestatæ.

12. Subscriptio instrumenti non continuo obligat scribentem.

13. Res hostium legari potest.

14. Creditor pignus naturaliter possidet.

15. Urbanum prædium distinguit a rustico, non locus, sed materia.

16. Remedium L. 2. Cod. de Rescind. Vendit. non habet locum in transactione.

17. Sola præstatio usurarum longo tempore facta non inducit obligationem usurarum in futurum.

18. Societas solvitur morte, heresque socii in societate non succedit.

19. Pro vino vel frumento mutuato reddi non potest pecunia, invito creditore.

20. Reus non tenetur actori edere instrumenta vel rationes ad intensionem ejus fundandam; sed actor res ad probandam exceptionem instrumenta edere tenetur.

21. Favorabiliores rei potius quam actores habentur.

22. Furti tenetur cujus ope vel consilio tantum furtum factum est.

23. Qui legat certam fructuum quantitatem, si non nascatur tantum, quantum legabit, hæres ad præstationem totius tenetur.

24. Testamentum, quo posthumus præteritus vivo testatore decessit, valet.

25. Fructus et usuræ legatorum a tempore moræ debentur.

26. Liberi et liberti non restituuntur in integrum contra parentes et patronos.

27. Redditio chirographi facta a creditore debitori, inducit remissionem debiti, pignoris vero restitutio non idem.

28. Usufructus non dominii pars sed servitus est.

29. Quando nihil pactum est de distrahendo pignore, creditor nihilominus post unam denunciationem pignus vendere potest.

30. Suspectus tutor ob latam culpam remotus non fit infamis.

31. Dominium sine possessione acquiri non potest.

32. Actionis verbo non continetur exceptio.

33. Privilegia realia transeunt ad hæredes, non personalia.

34. Major annis XVII. potest esse procurator ad litem.

35. In contractibus nominatis non datur condictio ob rem dati.
36. Unica interpellatio constituit debitorem in mora.
37. Venditor etsi fundum simpliciter vendat, tamen eum liberum a servitute præstare tenetur.
38. In contractibus jus accrescendi non habet locum.
39. Etiam ob latam culpam juratur in litem, et lata culpa sub dolo continetur in civilibus causis.
40. Nec urbanæ nec rusticæ servitutes oppignorari possunt.
41. Studio Juris longe præstantissimum est.
42. De omnibus quæ palam fiunt judicat Jurisconsultus, de occultis Ecclesia.
43. Omnis legislatio ad principem pertinet.
44. Ut et legum interpretatio.
45. Consuetudo legi non derogat.
46. Salus reipublicæ suprema lex esto.
47. Non usus sed utilitas gentium jus gentium constituit.
48. Judici sola applicatio legum ad casus competit.
49. Legum corpus nonquam colligendum.
50. Tabulæ potius conscribendæ, breves verbis, amplæ argumento.
51. Interpretationes a principe factæ separatim colligendæ, neque cum tabulis fundamentalibus confundendæ.
52. Sed qualibet generatione, vel novo quodam regnante ad summum imperium evecto, abrogandæ, atque novæ interpretationes a principe petendæ videntur.
53. Pænæ capitales non abrogandæ.
54. Lex Saxonica, quæ non nisi confessum et convictum condemnari vult, lex æquissima, effectu crudelissima evadit.
55. An foemina partum recentem editum trucidans capite plectenda sit? quæstio est inter Doctores controversa.
56. Servitus Juris naturalis est.

APPENDIX D.

List of works called forth by 'Werther.'

1. Briefe an eine Freundin über die Leiden des jungen Werther. Carlsruhe, 1775.

2. Des jungen Werther's Zuruf aus der Ewigkeit an die noch lebenden Menschen auf Erden. Ibid. 1775.

3. Werther an seinen Freund Wilhelm, aus dem Reiche der Todten. Berlin, 1775.

4. Berichtigung der Geschichte des jungen Werther's. Frankfurt und Leipzig, 1775.

5. Freuden des jungen Werther's ; Leiden und Freuden Werther's, des Mannes. Voran und zuletzt ein Gespräch. Berlin, 1775. (By Frederic Nicolai. Two editions of it appeared, the better one of which had a vignette by Chodowieck on the title-page.)

6. Ueber die Leiden des jungen Werther's. Gespräche. Berlin, 1775.

7. Etwas über die Leiden des jungen Werther's, und über die Freuden des jungen Werther's. Dresden, 1775.

8. Kurze, aber nothwendige Erinnerungen über die Leiden des jungen Werther's, über eine Recension derselben, und über verschiedene nachher erfolgte und dazu gehörige Aufsätze, von J. M. Goeze. Hamburg, 1775.

9. Schwacher, jedoch wohlgemeinter Tritt vor den Riss, neben oder hinter Herrn Pastor Goeze gegen die Leiden des jungen Werther und dessen ruchlose Anhänger. Hamburg, 1775.

10. Werther in der Hölle. Halle, 1775.

11. Die Leiden der jungen Wertherin. Eisenach, 1775.

12. Masuren oder der junge Werther. Ein Trauerspiel aus dem Illyrischen. Frankfurt und Leipzig, 1775.

13. Pätus und Arria; eine Künstler-Romanze. Freistadt am Bodensee, 1775.

14. Pätus und Arria; eine Künstler-Romanze. Und Lotte bei Werther's Grab; eine Elegie. Mit einer Musik-Beilage. Leipzig und Wahlheim, 1775.

15. Die Leiden des jungen Werther. Eine bekannte wahre Geschichte. Hierin sämmtliche Arien, welche von Albert, Lotte und Werther während der traurigen Begebenheit gedichtet worden sind. Berlin, 17 . . .

16. Eine trostreiche und wunderbare Historia, betittelt: Die Leiden und Freuden Werther's, des Mannes; zur Erbauung der lieben Christenheit in Reime gebracht, und fast lieblich zu lesen und zu singen. Im Ton: Ich Mädchen bin aus Schwaben; oder auch in eigener Melodei. Gedrückt allhier in diesem Jahre, da all's über'n armen Werther her war.

17. Eine entsetzliche Mordgeschichte von dem jungen Werther, wie sich derselbe den 21 December durch einen Pistolenschuss eigenmächtig ums Leben gebracht. Allen jungen Leuten zur Warnung in ein Lied gebracht, auch den Alten fast nützlich zu lesen. Im Ton: Hört zu, ihr lieben Christen. 1776.

18. Mordgeschichte des jungen Werther's. Romanze, 1776.

19. Das Werther Fieber, ein unvollendetes Familien Stück. Nieder-Deutsehland, 1776.

20. Die Leiden des jungen Werther's, ein Trauerspiel in drei Aufzügen fürs deutsche Theater, ganz aus dem Original gezogen. Bern, 1776.

21. Ernest, oder die unglücklichen Folgen der Liebe; ein Drama in drei Aufzügen. In einer freien Uebersetzung aus dem Französischen nach den Leiden des jungen Werther's gearbeitet. Berlin, 1776.

22. Versuch einer Poesie über einen wichtigen Brief des jungen Werther's, von einem Liebhaber der Dichtkunst, G. A. S. — Schwalbach, 1776.

23. Die Leiden des jungen Franken, eines Genie's. Minden, 1777.

24. Werther. Ein bürgerliches Trauerspiel in Prosa und drei Akten. Frankfurt und Leipzig, 1778.

25. Und er erschoss sich — nicht. Leipzig, 1778.

26. Man denkt verschieden bei Werther's Leiden, ein Schauspiel in drei Aufzügen. 1779.

27. Des jungen Werther's Freuden in einer bessern Welt. Ein Traum, vielleicht aber voll süßer Hoffnung für liebende Herzen; von dem Verfasser der Lieblingstunden. Berlin und Leipzig, 1780.

28. Kronholm, oder, Gleich ist Werther fertig. Schauspiel von Schmeider. Leipzig, 1783.

29. Ueber belletristische Schriftstellerei, mit einer Parallele zwischen Werther und Ardinghello. Allen belletristischen Schriftstellern und Lesern ihrer Schriften gewidmet. Strassburg, 1788.

30. Lotten's Briefe an eine Freundin, während ihrer Bekanntschaft mit Werthern. Aus dem Englischen übersetzt. Zwei Theile. Berlin und Stettin, 1788.

31. Narcisse, eine englische Wertheriade. Leipzig, 1793.

32. Des Amtmann's Tochter von Lüde. Eine Wertheriade für Aeltern, Jünglinge und Mädchen. Mit Kupfern. Bremen, 1797.

33. Aemil und Julie, oder die Unzertrennlichen. Ein Seitenstück zu Werther's Leiden, von K. Albrecht. Mit einem Titelkupfer: Carlo Dolce pinx. F. Ramberg sc. Berlin, 1800.

34. Die Leiden Werther's, eine wahre Geschichte. Nebst den zur Geschichte gehörigen Liedern. Berlin, 1800. [This is in reality the same version of the romance for the people as No. 17, except that it underwent a few alterations to adapt it to the period.]

35. Der neue Werther, oder Gefühl und Liebe. Von * * * * Nürnberg, 1804.

36. Die letzten Briefe des Jacopo Ortis. Nach dem Italienischen herausgegeben von Heinrich Luden. Göttingen, 1807. (These letters are by Ugo Foscolo, and are imitations of Werther.)

37. Praxede, oder der Französischen Werther. Uebersetzt von Saul Ascher. Berlin, 1809.

38. Letzte Briefe des Jacopo Ortis, nach der fünfzehnten, der ersten allein gleichförmigen und mit bibliographischen Zusät-zen vermehrten Ausgabe. Aus dem Italienischen. London (Zürich), 1817. (This edition contains also a comparison between Werther and Ortis.)

39. Letters from Wetzlar, written 1817, by Major James Bell. London, 1822. (This publication contains interesting historical notices of the young man whose love and death inspired Goethe with his work.)

40. Lotten's Geständnisse in Briefen an eine vertraute Freundin, vor und nach Werther's Tod geschrieben. Aus dem Englischen, nach der fünften amerikanischen Ausgabe. Mitt Lottens höchst ähnlichem Bildnisse, nach einem Familien Gemälde, und einem Facsimile ihrer Handschrift, aus einem Erinnerungsbuche. Trier, 1825.

END OF VOL. I.

